Now, this case grew out of a contention with which the Government of the United States had nothing to do. It was a contention between one party representing the State of Wisconsin and another party who sought to defend by showing that the title was outstanding in the United States. The Government of the United States had nothing to do with it. The action was to recover timber which grew upon that portion of the land which had not been conveyed before the expiration of the ten years' limit provided in the granting act for the completion of the whole road.

The contention on the part of the State of Wisconsin was that inasmuch as the United States had taken no steps to declare a forfeiture the lands upon which this timber grew was the property of the State. It was contended, on the other hand, that because these lands were granted for the completion of miles of road which had been completed after the ten years, that no title to the land was in the State of Wisconsin, but that the title had reverted to the United States.

Now, that was the contention. The Supreme Court of the United States sustained the contention of the State of Wisconsin; and why? Because the State of Wisconsin had perfect title to these lands? Not so. But because no one but the United States could take advantage of the condition in the grant.

They say, citing authority, that where there is a grant with a condition-subsequent, no party can take advantage of that subsequent condition except the grantor; and inasmuch as the Government of the United States was the grantor and the State of Wisconsin was the grantee, that no other person could challenge the title of the State of Wisconsin; and, therefore, they held in that suit between the State of Wisconsin and this other contending party, the Government of the United States keeping its hands out of the controversy, that the title of the State was good and would remain good until the Government of the United States should see proper to declare it forfeited.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question and get him to discuss it in connection with what he is saying. Suppose a third party purchases from the State and pays his money for it, does not he stand in exactly the condition that the State did?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Precisely. No guarantee can stand on any higher or better ground than the grantor. That is a universal principle of law applicable to land titles.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Supposing in that case that while that title was made when the grantee, the State, had good title, and nobody could interfere except the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States did not interfere, then, when in this condition, they sold to an individual and he paid his money for it, is it honest for the Government of the United States to go in and forfeit that man's title?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Why, undoubtedly; as I shall show you in a moment. Would the gentleman contend that the holders of this land are in better position because they got it from the United States than they would if they got it from an individual?

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is technical. I ask you if it is honest for the United States to do that?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I think it is. Let us test it and see. Let us test it in the case of individuals, and then you will be able to see the full force of the legal principle that ought to apply. I sell to my friend and convey to him a hundred acres of land, and I make him a deed with a condition subsequent.

Mr. COX. That is in the deed.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is in the deed, put in it in terms—that if certain things are not done that land is to revert to me. Now, he is the owner of the land, and holds the title as against everybody in the world except myself, whether he performs the conditions or not. But suppose he fails to perform the condition expressed in the deed, and after that failure my friend from Tennessee [Mr. COX] proposes to purchase the land from him. What is he charged to do?

Mr. STOCKDALE. But in a case where the land has been sold and the money is paid.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. As a rule the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to the sale of lands.

Mr. STOCKDALE. But there is an estoppel.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Suppose the original seller of the land, who makes this purchase that you have last spoken of, goes on and makes valuable improvements.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I am coming to that.

Mr. HERMANN. Right there, just allow me to ask the gentleman another question, so that he may answer both in the same connection. Where the grantor has derived substantial benefit from these so-called violations on the part of the grantee, as is the case of the Government of the United States in my own State with reference to these land-grant roads, what would you do then?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. COX. Before you pass from that, I desire to make an inquiry. I agree with you exactly. Here is a grant, and on the face of the grant there is a condition stated, with which the grantee must comply. As the question stands between him and the grantor, of course if the grantor is satisfied that he has complied with the condition of the grant then nobody else can complain.

When the Government of the United States issued to these railroad companies its patent or grant, and the railroad companies took it and have conveyed or sold their title to parties that are innocent, so far as that is concerned, does the grant from the Government of the United States to the railroad companies upon its face give notice to the purchaser of the land that there are conditions with which the railroad must comply. Is that on the face of the grant?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Every grant made by the Government of the United States is by force and operation of statute law, and the statute of the United States becomes a part of the deed of conveyance. That is a well recognized principle of law. You have got to go back to the source of your title before you can complain if you do not get a good title. Now let us apply these principles to the question here in hand, and see how they will operate; and in applying that rule I will show you that there is nothing of equity in this case that is claimed so vigorously by gentlemen on the other side of the question. The Government of the United States makes a grant with a condition.

Now, every holder of land under that grant is charged in common sense and in common law with notice of what is contained in the granting act. That is the source of all the title. You are charged by the law to look to this original source of title whenever you make a purchase of land held under legislative grant, and you are further charged with knowledge of every condition which the granting act discloses.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. May I interrupt the gentleman for a question?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. This bill provides for securing to the grantee of these lands 320 acres. Now, the conditions in the city in which I reside are these: Six hundred and forty acres of railroad land are covered by that city. That land was sold by the railroad company at a nominal price, but by the industry and energy of the people a city has been built upon it, and that property is worth to-day from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000. Now, under this bill, what are you going to do in a case of that kind?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I am arguing the legal question. If my time holds out, I will meet the case which the gentleman puts before I get through.

Mr. LACEY. Even if we have the legal right, would it not be bad policy to disturb all those titles?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Perhaps so; but I am dealing with the proposition assumed here by the gentleman from Oregon as a proposition of law, because when we dispose of a question of this kind we ought to distinguish clearly between legal principles and that which we may see proper to do under a claim of equity.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman discuss the question of law presented by section 9 of the act granting lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. All the granting acts are the same.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Oh, no; that is where the gentleman is mistaken; they are not all the same.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman read the provision to which he refers?

Mr. WILSON of Washington (reading):

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the United States make the several conditioned grants herein, and that the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company accept the same, upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the conditions hereof, and allow the same to continue for upwards of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States, by its Congress, may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. In regard to that I have only this to say: that those cases are subject to the same general principles that I am presenting in my argument. The title to each of those tracts of land is to be decided by the law under which the land is held. If there are any peculiarities in the case cited by the gentleman from Washington, it will not fall within the general rule of my argument.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But does not the gentleman see that if this bill should pass and become a law, it will take fifteen years to get this matter settled?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I do not know whether we shall pass the bill, or whether I shall vote for it. I am not talking about that; but I am talking about the legal principles which ought to control us in ascertaining whether we shall pass the bill or not.

I say there are land grants—whether this applies to the case cited by the gentleman from Washington or not I am not able to say now, because I have not given attention to that particular case—but I say there are cases originating under the law that I have before me where there is no consideration of law or equity opposing a forfeiture of certain lands. That is what I am trying to show.

Mr. MARSH. Allow me to ask this question: Instead of putting all these roads into one "omnibus bill," why does not the committee report a bill for each particular case?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I am not on the committee and can say nothing about that.

Mr. MARSH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he was a member of the committee.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. No, sir; I am an outsider, perhaps an interloper, in this debate.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. It is always a pleasure for us to hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Now, what are the facts? and I am talking about these grants where it is provided that if within ten years the whole road is not completed, then the land unsold shall revert to the United States.

Let us confine our attention to those cases. The Government of the United States makes a grant with conditions; and the final condition is that a reversion shall take place if the whole road is not completed within ten years. Now, what is the status of those who hold lands conveyed to them after the expiration of the ten years and not covered by any of the completed roads? That is the question to which I ask the attention of this committee.

A purchaser of land held in that condition, or a man who proposes to purchase land held in that condition, is charged with he duty of ascertaining whether his proposed vendor has or has not a legal title. How does he ascertain that fact? If his proposed vendor has a deed, it shows from whom he purchased; and so from one individual to another he may trace the line all along, until finally he is brought to the act of the Congress of the United States containing this condition of forfeiture.

If he is fool enough to buy land without making this sort of an investigation the fault is his, and he can not complain of anybody else. No man thinks it is a hardship if in a case between private individuals a purchaser loses his land through his own neglect to ascertain the title of the vendor. Why, because the Government happens to be the original vendor, should there be a distinction in principle? The purchaser buys, knowing—charged by the law with the knowledge—that his title is defective by reason of the fact that a condition contained in the original grant has not been complied with.

As a matter of law he has no title as against the original grantor. But I pause here now to emphasize the fact already adverted to that no man can question the validity of the title except the grantor, the Government of the United States; and you can not infer that because the courts have held, as between A and B, that A has a good title as against B, that therefore he has a good title against the Government, which conveyed with a condition.

Now, what about the equity? We have heard a great deal of that. There is no legal term, Mr. Chairman, that is more loosely used than that very term equity. Equity in its largest legal acceptation applies to remedy alone, not to principle. "Equity is the correction of that wherein the law by reason of its universality is deficient." Deficient in what? Deficient in remedy—in remedial power.

Equity follows the law; and when a man is charged by the law with the knowledge of a fact which by negligence he fails to ascertain, he can claim no equitable right to be relieved from the consequences of his negligence. And let us not forget that an equity when it exists is a matter of right—not of grace and favor.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I do not expect that the ranchers know very much of the law.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The law does not take cognizance of the fact that the rancher is not acquainted with the law. The presumption is that all men know the law, and ignorance of the law is no just foundation for equitable relief.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to what Congress shall do is quite another question. It is said that the title of the settlers ought to be confirmed because the Government of the United States received certain benefits from the road, which it was provided they should give to the Government in consideration of the grant.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit me a moment. Suppose we should declare the forfeiture, would the gentleman be willing to return to the settlers the double minimum price that they paid?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Well, that is not exactly a legal question.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Well, it is a very pertinent question in this connection. While you have forfeited in the State of Washington lands on a certain road there, the settlers who paid their money did not get the benefit of the railroad, for it was never built, and now they are not allowed to get the $2.50 an acre that they paid for the land. Do not you think that we are subject to a little equity in that transaction?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I will vote for any measure which may be produced here when I am convinced that it is one which will force the Government of the United States to be honest and pay its debts.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Let me say that I will join the gentleman in that, and I think it likely we could do some things to make the Government honest and pay its lawful debts.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I wish all of the members would feel that way, because I fear that the Congress is not always as prompt to recognize honest claims against the Government as it should be.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But the gentleman from Alabama doubtless recollects the forfeiture down the Columbia River in the last Congress?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. We forfeited that land, for which the settlers paid $2.50 per acre, the railroad has not been built, and the settlers get nothing.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Bring in your bill——

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I have already done so.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. And I will examine it, and if I am satisfied it is honest I will help the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I never ask anything but what is honest. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Now, as to the one legal proposition involved here, I had something to say in the Fifty-first Congress. The question is whether the fact that the roads did certain things for the Government as a common carrier operated as a waiver of its right to declare a forfeiture. And here is what I said on that question in that Congress when Mr. Payson of Illinois, who was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, used the arguments now being urged. I used this language:

> But the legislation spoken of by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Payson] can not operate as a waiver of forfeiture, for the reason that until the forfeiture is declared the roads are subject to the burdens imposed by the granting acts, and are rightfully treated as land-grant roads in the appropriation bills.

A word in answer to the proposition that the Government was required to do something when the lands were being conveyed by the original grantees. If I convey a piece of land to my friend from Washington, and burden the title with a condition, I am not required to interfere with a sale by him of the land, even though the sale is made after condition broken.

Mr. RAY. Now, taking a case where it is optional with you as the grantor, some condition having been broken, with notice to you to bring an action to forfeit the title. You do not do it. You see the person in possession, claiming under you, sell to me, receive his money, you standing by and saying nothing. You see me go into possession and put valuable improvements upon the land, exercising all the rights of ownership, and all this time you sit by and say nothing. Can you, then, after all that is done, and after that acquiescence, turn around and eject me?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That has been decided a thousand times in courts both of law and of equity.

Mr. RAY. It has been decided a thousand times that you can not do it, and I should like to see a decision where it has been decided that you could do it. I will defy you or any other man to show a decision in any other court, where it has been held that the right of forfeiture under the circumstances that I have defined should be exercised.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It may be an extravagance to say that there are a thousand such decisions——

Mr. RAY. It is not the law and never has been.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Suppose we go one step further with the illustration of the gentleman from New York. Suppose, in addition to that, that you aid in misleading the innocent party; then you are estopped, are you not?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I may be esstopped in a court of equity, but not at law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, in this case where the United States Government has absolutely aided in imposing upon these people by issuing its patents to the railroad after the condition is broken, then is it not esstopped?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes; and patents have been issued in the last few months.

Mr. RAY. Could you recover in a case of ejectment under those circumstances?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. In a case of ejectment the man holding the legal title would recover the land.

Mr. RAY. As against the equitable title?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Why, yes; you can not plead an equitable title in defense in an action of ejectment, except in those States where such defenses are allowed in actions at law.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman is mistaken in his proposition—absolutely wild.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Well, we will see. In a court of law any man can eject another from a piece of land if the plaintiff in the action holds the legal title, and it matters not how many equities have intervened in the sales that have occurred, except in those States where equitable defenses in courts of law are allowed by statute.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Which is the case in New York, and that is what has misled the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Perhaps so. But to answer the question, "Did the issuing of a patent create an equity?" Clearly not, because the patent conveyed no title. The title had already been conveyed by the granting act. The patent was simply the evidence of the title contained in the granting act, and gave no additional force to that title nor destroyed any of its defects.

Mr. Chairman, the hour of adjournment has passed, and while I have failed, because of frequent interruptions, to present in a connected way the legal points I had thought to make or to complete the answers to questions asked, I will not longer claim the floor.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Alabama has completed his remarks, I will make a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Several gentlemen around me have asked me to yield the floor.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman must understand that he can not have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I do not care. I will give up the floor.

Mr. McRAE. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 121) to amend an act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, approved September 29, 1890, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] asks unanimous consent to submit a report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, reported a bill (H. R. 7688) as a substitute for the bill (H. R. 4215) to amend sections 140 and 145 and to repeal sections 143 and 144 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to Presidential elections. The bill (H. R. 7688) was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

The bill H. R. 4215 was ordered to lie on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. STEVENS, for one week, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. McRAE (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

R. 7506) authorizing the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds for the construction of a county building at the county seat thereof, to report it without amendment. The bill is only ten lines long, and I ask for its present consideration, because of the necessities that surround the case.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the board of supervisors of the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, be, and is hereby, authorized to issue bonds of the said county not exceeding $15,000 in amount, payable in not less than two nor more than twenty years, and bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent per annum, for the construction of a county building at the county seat of said county.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me it is rather curious to give the authority of Congress to construct a building in a Territory.

Mr. FAULKNER. I can explain the bill to the Senator in a moment, if he will permit me. This is a county that has been newly formed and cut off from an old county. Under the act of Congress the old county had become indebted to the amount of what was equivalent to 4 per cent of its assessed value. When the new county was formed it had to assume its share of that indebtedness.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is to prevent action by the Territorial Legislature of Arizona?

Mr. FAULKNER. Because the act of Congress does not permit bonds to be issued or indebtedness created beyond 4 per cent of the assessed value of the property of the county, and as it had to assume its share of the indebtedness of the old county, there was no margin by which it could issue this small amount of $15,000 of bonds to erect a building in which the records of the county are to be kept.

Mr. MILLS. Why can not the house be built by taxation? I do not like this business of authorizing counties to sell bonds running fifteen and twenty years to get money to build a house. There is hardly any county in the United States that ought to have a court-house which can not get money by taxation to build it. I do not like the policy.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state that this is a new county, and of course it has assumed its share of the liabilities of the old county, so that the indebtedness has been put upon it which it has to meet by taxation. All that is asked is $15,000, to erect a building to preserve the records of the county. The report of the State officials is to the effect that the records are over a grocery store and are liable to be burned up at any moment.

Mr. MILLS. Can not $15,000 be raised by taxation for building the house?

Mr. FAULKNER. It seems not, with the additional liabilities that rest upon the county by reason of the indebtedness it had to assume.

Mr. MILLS. I hope my friend will at least limit the time the bonds are to run. Twenty years, with 5 per cent interest, to borrow $15,000 seems to me to be bad policy. Why not say four or five years? Certainly they can raise the money in five years.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will agree to make it ten years.

Mr. HARRIS. May I inquire of the Senator from West Virginia what county it is that is asking for this aid?

Mr. FAULKNER. A county in Arizona.

Mr. HARRIS. A county in a Territory?

Mr. FAULKNER. A county in the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. HARRIS. That was the point in my mind. I did not know what Congress had to do with it.

Mr. BATE. I wish to inquire what kind of money the bonds are to be paid in?

Mr. FAULKNER. The bill leaves the question, as all acts do, without specifying any kind of money.

Mr. GEORGE. It has to be lawful money.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, before the word "years," strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Payable in not less than two nor more than ten years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONSTRUCTION OF COUNTY BUILDING IN ARIZONA.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7506) authorizing the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds for the construction of a county building at the county seat thereof, to report it without amendment. The bill is only ten lines long, and I ask for its present consideration, because of the necessities that surround the case.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the board of supervisors of the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, be, and is hereby, authorized to issue bonds of the said county not exceeding $15,000 in amount, payable in not less than two nor more than twenty years, and bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent per annum, for the construction of a county building at the county seat of said county.

Mr. FAULKNER. It seems not, with the additional liabilities that rest upon the county by reason of the indebtedness it had to assume.

Mr. MILLS. I hope my friend will at least limit the time the bonds are to run. Twenty years, with 5 per cent interest, to borrow $15,000 seems to me to be bad policy. Why not say four or five years? Certainly they can raise the money in five years.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will agree to make it ten years.

Mr. HARRIS. May I inquire of the Senator from West Virginia what county it is that is asking for this aid?

Mr. FAULKNER. A county in Arizona.

Mr. HARRIS. A county in a Territory?

Mr. FAULKNER. A county in the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. HARRIS. That was the point in my mind. I did not know what Congress had to do with it.

Mr. BATE. I wish to inquire what kind of money the bonds are to be paid in?

Mr. GEORGE. It has to be lawful money.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, before the word "years," strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Payable in not less than two nor more than ten years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution which was under consideration yesterday.

Mr. BLACKBURN. With the permission of the Senator from Virginia, I submit the point that that resolution is not before the Senate, but that under the rule it went to the Calendar. The unfinished business that comes over from yesterday is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The unfinished business does not come before the Senate until 2 o'clock. The Senator from Virginia can move to take up the resolution and the Senator from Kentucky can move to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I admit it is in order for the Senator from Virginia to make the motion and by a vote of the Senate to have the resolution considered, but under the rule the resolution to which the Senator from Virginia refers has gone to the Calendar, and the only way to reach it is by a motion supported by a majority vote of the Senate to take it from the Calendar for consideration.

Mr. DANIEL. I so understand; and I make that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill indicated by the Senator from Kentucky stands exactly in the same position. It requires a motion to take it up before 2 o'clock.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator from Ohio is hardly correct in that statement. Unless the Senate shall by a vote take from the Calendar the resolution to which the Senator from Virginia alludes, then the morning hour will stand closed and the unfinished business will of its own motion come up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the Calendar is in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then it is to be done by motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia yesterday has gone to the Calendar, it being an amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas. At the close of the morning business and up to the hour of 2 o'clock the Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The morning business having closed, the Calendar, under Rule VIII, is now in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then, recognizing the exact correctness of the ruling of the Chair, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, it being the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Upon that I make the point of order that the motion I have made takes precedence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I merely wanted to know for what purpose the Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. I will proceed to state it, if I may be permitted to do so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not understand that the Senator from Virginia has the floor for the purpose of making a speech when a motion is pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the Chair entertains the motion made by him. The Senator from Virginia rises to a point of order. The Chair would be glad to hear the statement of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BLACKBURN. So will I.

Mr. DANIEL. I simply wish to state that I had understood the parliamentary situation of the case, and had made a motion to take up the resolution which I offered as a substitute for that of the Senator from Kansas, which on yesterday went to the Calendar.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Wait a moment.

Mr. DANIEL. I only wish to say that I think the Senator from Kentucky would expedite his own very important business and the proper transaction of matters in the Senate if he would allow this matter to occupy a small portion of the morning hour.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the Senator will allow me one moment, I will say that all I am trying to do is to get the Senate to take up and dispose of general appropriation bills that are needed to carry on the Government. We are in a new fiscal year, and not a single appropriation bill has been enacted into law. I waived the right I had to the floor yesterday for more than half the day. Now, I am sure that it is not the purpose of the Senator from Virginia to delay this important work, and I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. DANIEL. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Kentucky, and I will say that I have no desire or purpose to delay the Senate by any speech. I have not done so, and my record is an assurance of that fact.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his motion, and the Senator from Virginia will proceed.

SUPPRESSION OF LAWLESSNESS.

Mr. DANIEL. I simply wish to make a motion to take up the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], which was before the Senate yesterday, with the substitute which I offered pending thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out Mr. PEFFER'S resolution and insert:

Resolved, That the Senate indorses the prompt and vigorous measures adopted by the President of the United States and the members of his Administration to repulse and repress by military force the interference of lawless men with the due process of the laws of the United States, and with the transportation of the mails of the United States, and with commerce among the States.

It is within the plain constitutional authority of the Congress of the United States, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;" "to establish post-offices and post-roads," and to ordain and establish inferior courts; and the judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

It is the duty of the President under the Constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and to this end it is provided that he shall be "Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."

It is treason against the United States for a citizen to levy war against them, or to adhere to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

Those who combine to use force to assail or resist the constituted authorities of the United States, civil or military, should be warned of the magnitude of their offense; and those who earn honest bread by honest toil can do nothing more detrimental to their interests than to show them any sort of countenance in their lawless course.

The action of the President and his Administration has the full sympathy and support of the law-abiding masses of the people of the United States, and he will be supported by all departments of the Government and by the power and resources of the entire nation.

Mr. DANIEL. Upon consultation with several of my colleauges, both Republican and Democratic, I desire to modify my amendment by offering a second clause to the substitute which I proposed yesterday, which I shall read for the information of the Senate. It is as follows:

2. Resolved, That while the Senate thus explicitly declares its determination to support the Executive in the enforcement of the laws and in maintaining the supremacy of the Constitution, it deems it proper also to declare its adhesion to the principle of the arbitration of differences or controversies between the employers of labor and their employés, as recognized in the laws of the United States; and to express its condemnation of the refusal of any party to such controversies or differences connected with the late disturbances in the city of Chicago and its vicinity to submit such differences or controversies to fair and impartial arbitration. And the Senate also expresses its determination to use, in promotion of the arbitration of such differences or controversies, whatever constitutional power it may possess.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia as modified.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask leave to make a mere verbal correction. In line 27 of the paragraph beginning on line 24, page 2, it reads:

And those who earn honest bread by honest toil could do nothing more detrimental to their interests than to show them any sort of countenance in their lawless course.

The pronouns are a little mixed. I should rather it would read: "Nothing more detrimental to their interests than to countenance such persons in their lawless course."

Mr. DANIEL. I accept that. It is a very proper amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia accepts the modification, and the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether he intends that this last proposed amendment shall be substituted entirely for his first one?

Mr. DANIEL. Oh, no; only that it may be added as a second clause.

Mr. PEFFER. To take the place of the second clause only?

Mr. DANIEL. There is no second clause in the resolution which I offered yesterday. I offer this amendment to-day as a second clause.

Mr. PEFFER. In place of the present substitute?

Mr. DANIEL. Not in place of anything, but in addition to the resolution which I offered yesterday. I offer the amendment here to-day as a second clause.

Mr. CAREY. Does the Senator from Virginia want to destroy the force of the resolution he offered yesterday?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not withdraw anything I offered yesterday. I offer the substitute as I offered it yesterday, but I offer as an additional clause the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. CAREY. As I understand the resolutions which were introduced yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] they were for the purpose of upholding the hands of the President of the United States in the enforcement of the laws and maintaining the Constitution of the United States in Chicago. Now, the purpose, it appears to me, of the resolution of to-day is to lessen the effect of the resolutions of yesterday.

The Senate has nothing whatever to do with the settlement of difficulties between employers and employés. The Senate is now making resolves with reference to the disorder that exists in the city of Chicago and elsewhere in the United States.

Mr. DANIEL. Briefly, let me say to the Senator who has just spoken, than by an act approved October 1, 1888, which is a part of the law of this country, and which is entitled to as much respect as any other portion of it, the Congress of the United States and the President gave their sanction and approbation to the principle of arbitration and provided machinery for a peaceful settlement of such controversies as we now have to deal with, and the settlement of peace ought to be commended and put before all, in order that force may not be resorted to any further than may be absolutely indispensable. That is as much a part of the law and Constitution of the country as any of the laws which provide for the use of the military force, and it should receive equal consideration and be equally impressed upon the attention of the people.

Mr. CAREY. So far as the law is concerned, to which the Senator from Virginia refers, it has been inoperative and has been ineffective; it has never been called into operation, and it was passed, as many things are passed by Congress, to please somebody or other, but it has no effect whatever. It can not be enforced, and never has been enforced.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have but a single word to say on this matter, and I may as well say it on the amendment that is offered as when the question upon the passage of the resolution is reached.

I objected to the consideration of the resolution yesterday, but I did not do so because of any opposition I had to it. I had heard the resolution read casually; it was somewhat lengthy, and I did not fully comprehend its terms. I wanted to take time to examine it and see whether it might not need amendment. I will say to the Senate that my purpose was then to formulate, and I have since formulated, an amendment which I have on my desk in favor of arbitration. But I shall not offer the amendment, for the reason that the one submitted by the Senator from Virginia is a better one than mine. I shall very cordially support the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, and I congratulate him upon having, as I think, perfected his resolution by that amendment. I will go further than that, and say that I shall very cordially vote for the resolution as amended, if it shall be amended. I have no disposition to obstruct the Executive in the performance of his duty, and while I deeply deprecate the necessity for the employment of troops at Chicago and elsewhere, I believe the President is simply carrying out his duty in doing what he has done. While under other circumstances and other conditions I might feel constrained to enter some criticism upon utterances made by the Executive himself in the past relating to the relations between the employed and the employer in this country, I do not feel that it is my duty to do so to-day, and therefore content myself with this simple statement.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I should be very glad if there could be substituted for the resolution pending and the proposed amendment a simple resolution indorsing the action of the President in this matter. Like the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I was not yesterday prepared to vote upon the resolution which was offered upon hearing it read without being able to examine it, and I am not entirely clear to day in regard to some of the declarations contained in the resolution, but I did not intend to open my mouth and I do not now wish to criticise the Chief Executive in the action he has taken, but to commend him. If I had been in his place I should have done what he has done, even if there were some doubts in my mind as to the constitutional right to do so.

I am not quite pleased with the statement contained in the third clause of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Virginia, as follows:

It is the duty of the President under the Constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and to this end it is provided that he shall be "Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."

If that means in case of insurrection and a proper case made for the interference of Federal troops it is the duty of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy to interfere for the protection of life and property, I have no objection to the statement. It is correct.

But if it means that the President is made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and of the Navy for the purpose of enforcing the ordinary execution of the laws, or enforcing the law by process of the courts, I do not believe that that authority is conferred upon the President of the United States. It is his duty, in the first place, to see that the laws are enforced through the ordinary means of courts of justice and officers of the courts of justice. The law has provided how the process of a court of justice may be served and enforced, and it is only when there is an insurrection, as I have said, when there is organized treason against the Government, State or national, that the President is authorized to put into motion and to exercise the power conferred upon him as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and of the Navy.

Heretofore it has been supposed that in case of insurrection in a State it was not the duty of the President to act, if the Legislature was in session, until the Legislature had called for the interference of Federal troops, or if the Legislature was not in session, until the governor of the State had called for them. We have taken a new departure I think. I am not prepared to say that it is not right. I stand here and commend it, and say that what has been done by the Executive would be done by me under the same emergency if I had the authority; and I stand here to commend the President for his action and to say that it was fortunate for the country that there was a Chief Magistrate who had the backbone to do what he has done.

But I repeat that heretofore it has been supposed that the President could only use Federal troops in a State to suppress an insurrection or riot when the Legislature, if in session, called upon him, or if the Legislature was not in session, when the governor called upon him for Federal troops.

But, as I understand the present condition of affairs, the Administration started out to protect railroads which were in the hands of receivers, and now the protection is extended, without the request of the governor of Illinois at least, or the Legislature of Illinois, to railroads engaged in carrying the mails and railroads engaged in interstate commerce. I am not entirely certain and I have not examined the question critically enough to know whether the declarations contained in the resolution as to the legal aspects of this question are correct.

As I say, I should have been pleased to have voted for a resolution expressing confidence in the Administration and commending it for what it has done, leaving out the legal propositions which have been put into this resolution; but this morning it looks as if the Senator from Virginia had become afraid of the resolution he introduced yesterday, and having introduced a resolution yesterday sustaining the Administration in what it has done and commending it for what it has done, he proposes to add another clause to the resolution and throw a sop to those who are engaged in defying the laws, in destroying property, and in committing murder.

If I read the amendment aright it is a covert condemnation of the Pullman Company for its refusal to arbitrate. I want to know more about the facts of that matter before I undertake to give an expression as to the merits or demerits of the case. If I am going to make any declaration upon the subject, I want to do it squarely; I do not want to do it by implication; I do not want to do it by a resolution which has any double meaning. This proposed second section provides:

Resolved, That while the Senate thus explicitly declares its determination to support the Executive in the enforcement of the laws, and in maintaining the supremacy of the Constitution, it deems it proper also to declare its adhesion to the principle of the arbitration of differences of controversies between the employers of labor and their employés, as recognized in the laws of the United States.

What is the use of making that declaration? If Congress has passed a law which is on the statute books, is not that a sufficient declaration of both Houses of Congress? Why stop to throw a sop to Cerberus, to conciliate the elements which are seeking to overthrow the Government; which are undertaking to overthrow local government and to set the laws at defiance? Why make any declaration upon the subject?

But this proposed amendment proceeds:

And to express its condemnation of the refusal of any party to such controversies or differences connected with the late disturbances in the city of Chicago and its vicinity to submit such differences or controversies to fair and impartial arbitration.

It does not say "any refusal," but it says "the refusal," and it specifies the controversy:

The refusal of any party to such controversies or differences connected with the late disturbances in the city of Chicago and its vicinity to submit such differences or controversies to fair and impartial arbitration.

It assumes that there has been a refusal by someone to submit the present existing controversies in the city of Chicago to fair and impartial arbitration. I do not think that this Senate should adopt a resolution of that kind, offered now for the first time, which is not in print, and which Senators have only heard read from the desk and have had no opportunity to examine. I am willing to go as far as any Senator in making any declaration here that will hold up the hands of the Administration in this trying hour, I am willing to vote for any resolution of approval, and I will not stop to make any question upon legal technicalities, but I should like to stop there.

I do not like to be forced to vote upon a resolution of this kind containing such declarations as this contains, until it is printed and I have had time to examine it and to ascertain the facts myself. I hope at least that the Senator from Virginia will withdraw the amendment or stop with the declaration that the Senate still adheres to the principle of arbitration.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, it often happens that in endeavoring to go too much into detail we get into such discussion as to forget the main object we are seeking. This happens in the case of the pending resolution. Here is a matter almost wholly foreign, quite outside of the field, which the Senate undertook to occupy, which is brought into this discussion and causes difference of opinion in the Chamber, whereas upon what we really seek to reach, I hope and believe there is entire unanimity here. I should be perfectly satisfied with a brief resolution like this which I have sketched:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and commends the course of the Chief Executive in his efforts to execute the laws and preserve the peace.

You spread it over ten pages and you do not say anything more. I shall also be content with the first paragraph of the two pages of the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia:

Resolved, That the Senate indorses the prompt and vigorous measures adopted by the President of the United States and the members of his Administration to repulse and repress, by military force, the interference of lawless men with the due process of the laws of the United States, and with the transportation of the mails of the United States, and with commerce among the States.

I think that is quite sufficient. The Senate wants to say that, and it does not want to say that Mr. Pullman made a mistake in refusing arbitration. I do not think he did refuse it, if the facts were known; but I do not care to discuss that point.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I think we all seek a common purpose in the right spirit. I do not wish to prolong the debate at a time when the Senate has so many important matters before it. If it would be acceptable to the Senators who have just spoken, the Senator from Connecticut]Mr. HAWLEY] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], I should propose to drop all of my resolution except the first clause, which goes at once to the root of this matter.

Mr. PLATT. That is right.

Mr. HAWLEY. I sincerely think that would be best.

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

Mr. DANIEL. And I would retain the last clause, which is to the same effect.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have just been reading that clause. It is good.

Mr. DANIEL. I will drop all except the first and the last clause.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the Senator mark the parts of the resolution which he proposes to retain, and have them read from the desk.

Mr. HAWLEY. He retains the first and last clauses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, as modified by him.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate indorses the prompt and vigorous measures adopted by the President of the United States and the members of his Administration to repulse and repress, by military force, the interference of lawless men with the due process of the laws of the United States, and with the transportation of the mails of the United States, and with commerce among the States.

The action of the President and his Administration has the full sympathy and support of the law-abiding masses of the people of the United States, and he will be supported by all departments of the Government and by the power and resources of the entire nation.

Mr. HALE and Mr. SHERMAN. That is right.

Mr. HAWLEY. That will do.

Mr. PLATT. That is right.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, Mr. President, one word in conclusion. The reason why I introduced the subject of arbitration was because of the statute, because of the message of the President which was sent to Congress, and because of the general policy of this nation to facilitate peaceful settlements of all questions. But perceiving that it would involve criticism, for which we are perhaps not fully prepared, and which might do injustice with the limited information which is before us, I defer consideration of that question to a more convenient season. I shall be satisfied to have the resolution voted upon in the form in which it is now presented.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to put on record the message of the President of the United States sent to Congress April 22, 1886, on the subject of arbitration. I send it to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD in ordinary type. It need not be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. All right.

Mr. CULLOM. There is no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The message referred to is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The Constitution imposed upon the President the duty of recommending to the consideration of Congress from time to time such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

I am so deeply impressed with the importance of immediately and thoughtfully meeting the problem which recent events and a present condition have thrust upon us, involving the settlement by arbitration of disputes arising between our laboring men and their employers, that I am constrained to recommend to Congress legislation upon this serious and pressing subject.

Under our form of government the value of labor as an element of national prosperity should be distinctly recognized, and the welfare of the laboring man should be regarded as especially entitled to legislative care. In a country which offers to all its citizens the highest attainment of a social and political distinction its workingmen can not justly or safely be considered as irrevocably consigned to the limits of a class and entitled to no attention and allowed no protest against neglect.

The laboring man, bearing in his hand an indispensable contribution to our growth and progress, may well insist, with manly courage and as a right, upon the same recognition from those who make our laws as is accorded to any other citizen having a valuable interest in charge; and his reasonable demands should be met in such a spirit of appreciation and fairness as to induce a contented and patriotic coöperation in the achievements of a grand national destiny.

While the real interests of labor are not promoted by a resort of threats and violent manifestations, and while those who, under the pretexts of an advocacy of the claims of labor, wantonly attack the rights of capital, and for selfish purposes or the love of disorder sow the seeds of violence and discontent, should be neither encouraged nor conciliated, all legislation on the subject should be calmly and deliberately undertaken, with no purpose of satisfying unreasonable demands or of gaining partisan advantage.

The present condition of the relations between labor and capital is far from satisfactory. The discontent of the employed is due in large degree to the grasping and heedless exactions of employers, and the alleged discrimination in favor of capital as an object of governmental attention. It must be also conceded that the laboring men are not always careful to avoid causeless and unjustifiable disturbance.

Though the importance of a better accord between these interests is apparent, it must be borne in mind that any effort in that direction by the Federal Government must be greatly limited by constitutional restrictions. There are many grievances which legislation by Congress can not redress, and many conditions which can not by such means be reformed.

I am satisfied, however, that something may be done under Federal authority to prevent the disturbances which so often arise from disputes between employers and the employed, and which at times seriously threaten the business interests of the country, and in my opinion the proper theory on which to proceed is that of voluntary arbitration as the means of settling these difficulties.

But I suggest that instead of arbitrators chosen in the heat of conflicting claims, and after each dispute shall arise, for the purpose of determining the same, there be created a commission of labor, consisting of three members, who shall be regular officers of the Government, charged, among other duties, with the consideration and settlement, when possible, of all controversies between labor and capital.

A commission thus organized would have the advantage of being a stable body, and its members, as they gained experience, would constantly improve in their ability to deal intelligently and usefully with the questions which might be submitted to them. If arbitrators are chosen for temporary service as each case of dispute arises, experience and familiarity with much that is involved in the question will be lacking, extreme partisanship and bias will be the qualification sought on either side, and frequent complaints of unfairness and partiality will be inevitable. The imposition upon a Federal court of a duty so foreign to the judicial function as the selection of an arbitrator in such cases is at least of doubtful propriety.

The establishment by Federal authority of such a bureau would be a just and sensible recognition of the value of labor, and of its right to be represented in the Departments of the Government. So far as its conciliatory offices had relation to disturbances which interfered with transit and commerce between the States, its existence would be justified, under the provisions of the Constitution, which gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." And in the frequent disputes among the laboring men and their employers, of less extent and the consequences of which are confined within State limits and threaten domestic violence, the interposition of such a commission might be tendered upon the application of the Legislature or executive of a State, under the constitutional provision which requires the General Government to "protect" each of the States "against domestic violence."

If such a commission were fairly organized, the risk of a loss of popular support and sympathy resulting from a refusal to submit to so peaceful an instrumentality would constrain both parties to such disputes to invoke its interference and abide by its decisions. There would also be good reason to hope that the very existence of such an agency would invite application to it for advice and counsel, frequently resulting in the avoidance of contention and misunderstanding.

If the usefulness of such a commission is doubted because it might lack power to enforce its decisions, much encouragement is derived from the conceded good that has been accomplished by the railroad commissions which have been organized in many of the States, which, having little more than advisory power, have exerted a most salutary influence in the settlement of disputes between conflicting interests.

In July, 1884, by a law of Congress, a Bureau of Labor was established and placed in charge of a Commissioner of Labor, who is required to "collect information upon the subject of labor, its relations to capital, the hours of labor, and the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity."

The commission which I suggest could easily be ingrafted upon the Bureau thus already organized by the addition of two more commissioners and by supplementing the duties now imposed upon it by such other powers and functions as would permit the commissioners to act as arbitrators when necessary between labor and capital under such limitations and upon such occasions as should be deemed proper and useful.

Power should also be distinctly conferred upon this Bureau to investigate the causes of all disputes as they occur, whether submitted for arbitration or not, so that information may always be at hand to aid legislation on the subject when necessary and desirable.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

APRIL 22, 1886.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], as modified, to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, with all due deference to Senators who have reached this harmonious agreement that the action of the President in calling out the military shall be indorsed, and that it is not advisable to put on record our approval of arbitration, I am not content to have the matter go that way without an effort on my part to secure an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Virginia in these words:

While thus indorsing the action of the Chief Executive, the Senate approves the principle of voluntary arbitration as a potent means of settling disputes between employers and their employés.

I simply ask for a vote upon the amendment, and shall be content with whatever may happen.

Mr. DANIEL. There is no objection to that. I will accept it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do object. Arbitration is on the statute book already. Everybody knows that the United States favors it, from the case at Geneva down. I do not see any necessity to say anything more than that we approve the action of the President taken in the last fortnight to execute the law and preserve the peace. That is what we want to say and nothing more.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, we are confronted with one supreme question, and that is who is President of the United States and whether we have any United States? The question is whether the person whom we elected to be our Chief Executive is the Chief Executive of the United States or whether a man who calls himself President Debs is the President and Chief Executive of the United States.

Any other question injected into this discussion seems to me entirely out of place. The Senate should express its approval of what its lawfully elected President has done; and our views about arbitration and all those matters can be discussed hereafter. They are in the form of law. I object to anything except the straight, square, manly indorsement of what President Cleveland has done, and I shall vote against anything else.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am ready for a vote. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the substitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask for a division on agreeing to my amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask to have the amendment reported, so that we may know precisely what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add as an additional paragraph:

While thus indorsing the action of the Chief Executive, the Senate approves the prihcipal of voluntary arbitration as a potent means of settling disputes between employers and employés.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I am called upon to vote upon this question, I wish simply to say that while I shall vote for the proposition every day in the week—Sunday, Monday, or at any proper time—I am opposed to it here as an attachment to the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, which I think ought to be adopted by itself, single and alone. No one who will vote against the amendment will be misunderstood. His vote will be understood perfectly well. We do not vote against the proposition itself, but we vote against putting it upon the resolution of the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the substitute, upon which a division is called for.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 10, noes 27; no quorum voting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum having voted, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let us have another division.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent that we take the vote by a division again, so as not to consume time in calling the roll.

Mr. KYLE. I object. I should like to have a roll call on the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The point of order I wish to submit to the Chair is that attention was not called to the fact that a quorum had not voted. It is not the province of the Chair to direct a call of the roll unless the point is made that a quorum has failed to vote.

Mr. CULLOM. The lack of a quorum was disclosed by the division.

Mr. MANDERSON. It had been shown by the result of the division reported by the Secretary to the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was within the province of any member of the Senate to call attention to the fact that no quorum had voted; but no Senator had taken occasion to do so.

Mr. MANDERSON. The absence of a quorum appeared to the Chair from the division.

Mr. DOLPH. The Chair stated that a quorum had not voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky that more than one Senator announced from his seat that no quorum had voted; but, aside from that, the Chair was bound, upon the report by the Secretary to the Chair of the result of the division, to take notice of the fact that no quorum had voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Faulkner,	Jones, Ark.	Platt,
Allison,	Gallinger,	Kyle,	Power,
Bate,	George,	Lindsay,	Proctor,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Blanchard,	Gordon,	Manderson,	Roach,
Brice,	Gorman,	Martin,	Sherman,
Cameron,	Gray,	Mills,	Shoup,
Carey,	Hale,	Mitchell, Oregon	Smith,
Coke,	Hansbrough,	Mitchell, Wis.	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Vest,
Daniel,	Hunton,	Pasco,	Walsh,
Dolph,	Irby,	Peffer,	White.
Dubois,	Jarvis,	Perkins,

Mr. BATE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is absent, engaged in the room of the Committee on Finance upon public business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the substitute of the Senator from Virginia, upon which a division is called for.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 35.

Mr. KYLE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLS. The yeas and nays have been refused.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

Mr. MILLS. The yeas and nays were called for once on this question and refused.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the substitute is rejected. The question recurs on agreeing to the substitute of the Senator from Virginia for the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to know whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia is to be a substitute for or an addition to my resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5923) for the relief of Michael Scanlon was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 7434) directing the issue of a duplicate of a lost check drawn by Capt. W. H. Bixby, Engineers, United States Army, at Newport, R. I., in favor of Messrs. Hughes Brothers & Bangs, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6108) making appropriation for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 9, to insert "Belgium" before "Colombia;" and in line 10, before the word "thousand," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Argentine Republic, Belgium, Colombia, Peru, Turkey, and Chile, at $10,000 each, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 16, before the word "Denmark," to strike out "Belgium" and insert "Switzerland;" so as to make the clause read:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Switzerland, Denmark, Hawaiian Islands, Netherlands, and Venezuela, at $7,500 each, $37,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, to strike out lines 4, 5, and 6, in the following words:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Switzerland and Portugal, at $6,500 each, $13,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 6, to insert:

Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Portugal, $6,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 22, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty-three thousand" and insert "sixty-six thousand five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

Total, $366,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, to strike out lines 23 and 24, in the following words:

Secretary of legation and consul-general to Honolulu, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 5, to insert:

Secretary of legation to Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Salvador, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 18, before the word "hundred," to strike out "fifty-two thousand four" and insert "fifty thousand two;" so as to make the clause read:

Total, $50,275.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three," and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "six;" so as to make the clause read:

Interpreters to legations to China and Turkey, at $3,000 each, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 24, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Interpreter to legation to Japan, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "one thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Interpreter to legation and consulate-general to Korea, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "eleven;" so as to make the clause read:

Total, $11,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, before the word "thousand," to insert "and five;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seas, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, postage, telegrams, furniture, messenger service, clerk hire, compensation of cavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreter, guards, and Arabic clerk at the consulate at Tangier, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, and San Francisco, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of legations, and for printing in the Department of State, $105,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 6 on page 8.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to offer an amendment with the approbation of the Senator from Kentucky, in charge of the bill. I offer the amendment now, to be disposed of at this time. I move to insert what I send to the desk on page 8, after the word "dollars," in line 6. I beg to state this is an amendment recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I believe unanimously. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Page 8, after the word "dollars," in line 6, insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to purchase from John H. Haswell, chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives in the Department of State, the manuscript of "The Chronological History of the Department of State and the Foreign Relations of the Government from September 5, 1774, to July 1, 1885," prepared by him, the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated. And the Public Printer is hereby authorized, upon the requisition of the Secretary of State, to cause to be printed and bound in cloth, for the use of the Department of State, 1,000 copies of the above-mentioned work.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to make a short explanation of the amendment. As I stated, this amendment was introduced and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee reported it back, unanimously approving of the amendment, and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations did not insert the amendment in the bill, and I ask the Senate now to insert it. It is for the purpose of purchasing the work of Mr. Haswell. It is a work which is of extreme value to the State Department especially, and of great value, but less value, to all the Departments of the Government.

I beg to say, if the Senate will listen to an explanation, that this appropriation has been recommended by every Secretary of State since it has been before the Government for adoption. In 1885 Mr. Frelinghuysen wrote a strong letter to Hon. John F. Miller, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, in which he said:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 24, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to again call your attention to the work prepared by Mr. John H. Haswell, chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives in this Department, entitled "The Chronological History of the Department of State and the Foreign Relations of the Government from September 5, 1774, down to the Present Time," and to express to you my earnest hope that Congress will not adjourn without appropriating a sum of money for the purchase of the manuscript from the compiler. The work has been compiled with infinite attention to historical accuracy and completeness by a gentleman whose long and efficient service in the Department has put him in a position to know perfectly the details of the subject on which he has written, and his researches outside the Department have resulted in the discovery of many important and hitherto unknown facts in the history of our foreign relations that should be at the service of the Department.

I do not think $6,000 too large a sum to pay Mr. Haswell for his work, considering the value of the book to this Department and the foreign service generally, and I earnestly recommend that that sum be appropriated for its purchase.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FREDK. T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Hon. JOHN F. MILLER,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

I beg leave to state in this connection that the sum of $6,000 recommended for the purchase of this work was by the Committee on Foreign Relations reduced to $5,000, and the amendment appropriates the latter and smaller sum.

Secretary Blaine, under date May 6, 1892, in a personal letter to the chairman of this committee—strongly recommended the purchase of the manuscript designated in the amendment, and similar recommendations (hereto annexed) had previously been made by Mr. Frelinghuysen, and also by Mr. Blaine.

That is, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate—

I shall not detain the Senate by reading in full the letter of Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State. I have it before me and any Senator can read it who desires. This same appropriation for the purpose of purchasing this book was strongly recommended by Hon. John W. Foster on the 14th of January, 1893, when he was Secretary of State, and he recommended an appropriation of $6,000 to purchase it. It was also recommended by Mr. McCulloch on the 21st of January, 1885, when he was Secretary of the Treasury. It was also recommended by Mr. Frelinghuysen on January 18, 1885. Then Henry O'Connor, Examiner of Claims in the Department of State, under date of September 26, 1883, strongly recommended that the Government should purchase this work. The present Secretary of State also wants the purchase made.

Sir, when these Government officials, representing the Government of the United States in the Department of State, have in succession, whenever the Department has changed heads, recommended this purchase, and the Committee on Foreign Relations have unanimously recommended that the purchase be made, and though they do not propose to give the $6,000 asked for the work by Mr. Haswell, they reduce it to $5,000 and recommend that the appropriation be made, I think there ought to be no hesitation in adopting this amendment to purchase a book which all the heads of the Department of State say is invaluable to that Department and which is quite valuable to other Departments of the Government. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, it is true that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia was favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Upon that report it was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, where it was thoroughly considered and the conclusion reached by the Committee on Appropriations was that there was no merit in the amendment. I would not care so much about it if it simply carried the appropriation for the purchase of a record that the Committee on Appropriations has deliberately concluded is absolutely worthless. It is not that, but the amendment provides for the publication of the book by the thousand, entailing an expense upon the Government for publication in addition to purchase for which the Committee on Appropriations thinks that there is no warrant or excuse whatever.

It was the deliberate judgment of the Committee on Appropriations that this record was not worth one penny, even if that was a counterfeit penny. I am not opposing the amount of money that is proposed to be given to purchase the work. The country is flooded with possessors of worthless records who come to Congress and not only ask us to buy them when we have no use on earth for them, but they ask us to publish them by the thousand when a search warrant would not develop a human being in the country who would ever read one of them; and the Committee on Appropriations thinks that this is one of these worthless, valueless, spurious records.

If the Senate wants to put it into the bill I am content, but I wish very much that the Senator from Virginia would divide his amendment and offer the first proposition, which is to buy what the Committee on Appropriations does not think the Government wants and stop there, and not afflict the country with the publication by the thousand of a useless, valueless, worthless record.

Mr. HUNTON. I accept the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky in charge of the bill, but I can not for the life of me conceive how he arrives at the conclusion that the book if published will be absolutely worthless. Four or five Secretaries of State and one Secretary of the Treasury have said that it is a most useful work, and the Government must have it. I think, with due respect to the Senator from Kentucky, that the Secretary of State, who has to deal with all the questions treated of in the book, knows a little more about it than he does.

The Committee on Foreign Relations has unanimously recommended that this book be not only purchased, but published; and I offset the action of that committee against the action of the Committee on Appropriations. I beg to suggest to my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, that the Committee on Foreign Relations knows more about what is useful to the State Department in dealing with questions affecting the foreign relations of the country than the Committee on Appropriations. But if it suits the pleasure of my friend from Kentucky to divide the amendment I have no objection, and I will ask that a separate vote be taken, first upon the purchase of the work, and then if that is carried, upon the publication of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be so divided. The Secretary will state the first branch of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 6, after the word "dollars," insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to purchase from John H. Haswell, chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives in the Department of State, the manuscript of "The Chronological History of the Department of State and the Foreign Relations of the Government from September 5, 1774, to July 1, 1885," prepared by him, the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second branch of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

And the Public Printer is hereby authorized, upon the requisition of the Secretary of State, to cause to be printed and bound in cloth for the use of the Department of State 1,000 copies of the above-mentioned work.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Intercontinental Railway Commission," on page 10, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the clause read:

Share of the United States of the cost of printing and publishing reports, maps, etc., of the preliminary survey for an intercontinental railway, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 23, after the word "Panama," to insert "Honolulu," and in line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty," and insert "twenty-four;" so as to make the clause read:

Consuls-general at Berlin, Montreal, Kanagawa, Panama, Honolulu, and Mexico (city), at $4,000 each, $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 8, to insert:

Consuls-general at Barcelona and Tangier, at $2,500 each, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 12, to insert:

Consul-general at Maracaibo, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, to strike out lines 14 and 15, in the following words:

Consuls-general at Santo Domingo and Barcelona, at $1,500 each, $3,000.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 15, to insert:

Consul-general at Santo Domingo, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 19, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Total, $107,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and two" and insert "three hundred and ninety-one;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents, $391,500, as follows, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRICE. On page 12, line 24, under the head of "Germany," I move to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls," and after "Barmen," to insert "and Nuremberg."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, before the word "at," it is proposed to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls;" and after the word "Barmen," to insert "and Nuremberg," so as to read:

Consuls at Barmen and Nuremberg.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 13, line 24, to insert:

Danish Dominions:
Consul at St. Thomas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 2, before the word "at," to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls;" so as to make the clause read:

Consuls at Lyons and Marseilles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 5, after the word "Chemnitz," to insert "Cologne;" so as to make the clause read:

Consuls at Annaberg, Aix la Chapelle, Bremen, Stuttgart, Chemnitz, Cologne, Hamburg, Nuremburg, Mayence, and Plauen.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRICE. To conform to the amendment already made, I move to strike out "Nuremberg," in line 5, on page 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, on page 14, it is proposed to strike out "Nuremberg;" so as to read: "Hamburg, Mayence, and Plauen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. KYLE. On page 14, line 18, I move to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls;" and after the word "Smyrna" to insert "and Jerusalem." I do this after consultation with the Senator from Kentucky who has the bill in charge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 18, before the word "at," it is proposed to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls;" and after "Smyrna," to insert "and Jerusalem;" so as to read:

Consuls at Smyrna and Jerusalem.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want to offer any objection to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota; but speaking for the committee, I would say there is no recommendation for this. It is an increase of salary at a point where we all know there is no business to transact and where nothing is done. The place itself is a sinecure, and it would be well to abolish it.

The Senator tells me that the consul at Jerusalem advises him that he can not live upon his present pay. I simply answer and say that there is not an ambassador, a minister plenipotentiary, a minister resident, a consul-general, or a consul, who is carried in this bill, who does not write to me telling me the same thing. We have no more business with a consul at Jerusalem than a wagon has with forty wheels.

If that consul can not live upon $2,000 a year, it seems to me that the better thing for him to do would be to resign and let the place become vacant. I am sure the best thing would be to abolish the consulate, but I do not want to antagonize the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. KYLE. I recognize what the Senator says that it might be as well to abolish the place, but while it is thought wise to keep a consul at Jerusalem, I think we ought to keep him in good shape. Germany, England, and all other countries pay from four to six thousand dollars a year for exactly the same service, and this man has had to use money out of his own pocket to pay for the furniture in his office.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no doubt of that; but at the same time I have no doubt that the only official duty that that consul has ever discharged was in writing a letter to my honorable friend asking to have his salary increased. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JARVIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 14, line 24, before the word "at," to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls;" and in the same line, before the word "Pernambuco," to insert "Bahia, Para, and;" so as to read:

Consuls at Bahia, Para, and Pernambuco.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 8, after the word "at," to strike out "Cologne;" so as to make the clause read:

Consuls at Crefeld, Dusseldorf, Leipsic, Brunswick, Sonneberg, Magdeburg, and Furth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 11, before the word "Cardiff," to insert "Belize (British Honduras);" in line 15, before the word "Toronto," to insert "and;" and in line 16, after the word "(Canada)," to strike out "Bermuda, and Auckland (New Zealand);" so as to make the clause read:

Consuls at Belize (British Honduras), Cardiff, Chatham, Cork, Dublin, Dunfermline, Hamilton (Ontario), Leeds, Nassau (New Providence), Port Louis (Mauritius), Port Stanley and St. Thomas (Canada), St. John (New Brunswick), Sherbrooke (Canada), Sydney (New South Wales), and Toronto (Canada).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, to strike out the clause from lines 21 to 25, inclusive, as follows:

For salary and expenses of a commercial agent at Boma, in the Lower Kongo Basin, with authority to visit and report upon the commercial resources of the Upper and Lower Kongo Basins, their products, their minerals, their vegetable wealth, and the openings for American trade, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that "Jerusalem," which occurs in line 19, on page 16, has been inserted at another point.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In order to make the bill conform to the amendment which has been made, I ask that the words "and Jerusalem," be stricken out of line 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 19, page 16, it is proposed to strike out the word "consuls" and insert "consul;" and in the same line, after word "Beirut," strike out "and Jerusalem;" so as to read:

Consul at Beirut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 16, line 23, after the word "Santos," to strike out "Bahia, and Para;" so as to read:

Consul at Santos.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 17, to strike out lines 1 and 2, in the following words:

Denmark and Danish Dominions:
Consuls at Copenhagen and St. Thomas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 2, to insert:

Denmark:
Consul at Copenhagen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 11, before the word "Barbados," to insert "Auckland (New Zealand)," and in the same line, before the word "Bristol," to insert "Bermuda;" so as to read:

Consuls at Amherstburg (Canada), Antigua (West Indies), Auckland (New Zealand), Barbados, Bermuda, Bristol, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 20, after the word "Montreal," to insert "Ottawa," and in line 22, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighteen thousand" and insert "nineteen thousand two hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

Berlin, Bremen, Chemnitz, Crefeld, Frankfort, Hamburg, Havre, Hongkong, Kanagawa, Lyons, Manchester, Mexico (city), Montreal, Ottawa, Barmen, and Vienna, at $1,200 each, $19,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 1, to insert:

Rome, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. On page 21, line 12, after the word "Guayaquil," I move to insert "and Victoria."

Mr. HALE. Then it will be necessary to strike out "Victoria," where it occurs in line 16 on the same page.

Mr. RANSOM. I shall move to strike that out later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 12, after the word "Guayaquil," it is proposed to insert "and Victoria;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert the word "each:" so as to read:

Guayaquil and Victoria, $800 each.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is an increase, I believe, of $200.

Mr. RANSOM. One hundred and sixty dollars.

Mr. BLACKBURN. An increase of $160. I have no right to speak for the committee; but for myself I am disposed to think the amount of business done at Victoria warrants the amendment which the Senator from North Carolina offers, and for myself I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. In order to make the bill conform, in line 15, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "four" and insert "five;" and in the same line, after the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "six." It is merely to add $800 there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. Now, I move, in line 16, to strike out "and Victoria;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out the words "each $1,280."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 16, after the word "Leith," it is proposed to strike out "and Victoria;" and, after the word "dollars," to strike out "each $1,280."

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. I ask if the amendments offered by the Senator from North Carolina are increases of salaries?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is an increase of $160 for clerk hire, and not for salary. I answer, speaking for myself and not for the committee, that in my judgment the business that is transacted at Victoria is sufficiently large to warrant the amendment which the Senator from North Carolina has offered.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that all that it adds?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all. It is not an increase of salary, but an appropriation of $160 for the increase of clerk hire.

Mr. GEORGE. I will remark incidentally here that I regard all the salaries now paid as too high, and therefore I am opposed to all increases.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I assure the Senator that it is no increase of salary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 21, line 13, before the word "Palermo," to strike out "Ottawa;" and in the same line, after the words "St. Gall," to insert "St. Petersburg;" so as to make the clause read:

Messina, Palermo, St. Gall, St. Petersburg, Smyrna, and Tangier, at $800 each, $4,800.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is a transfer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 17, to insert:

Cairo, Cologne, Constantinople, Huddersfield, Mayence, Munich, Nottingham, Odessa, Para, Pernambuco, Tampico, and Vera Cruz, at $600 each, $7,200.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is done upon the recommendation of the Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to offer an amendment on page 22, line 2, after the word "Horgen," to insert "and Zurich, each." I attract the attention of the Senator from Kentucky, in charge of the bill, to this circumstance, that Zurich is the most important point commercially in Switzerland, and Horgen is a town of much less importance, which does much less business, and is situated within some 10 or 12 miles of Zurich. Zurich, under the bill as framed, is allowed $480 for clerk hire. In other words, $120 less than Horgen.

I know that the present incumbent of the office pays the greater part of the clerk hire himself. It simply makes the matter uniform, but even then there will be decidedly a reason in favor of Zurich having a further increase. The fact of the matter is that about one-third of the fees were collected at Horgen last year, and the other fees were collected at Zurich, so that there seems to be no objection founded in reason why the amendment should not be allowed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On page 22, line 2, the Senator proposes to raise Zurich to $600, from $480.

Mr. WHITE. I will modify my amendment. In line 20, on page 21, before the words "Vera Cruz," I will move to strike out the word "and," and after the words "Vera Cruz" to insert "Horgen and Zurich."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I only want to say that there is no recommendation from the Department for this increase, and I wish to call attention to the fact that such consulates as Berne, Demerara, Florence, Genoa, Naples, and Stuttgart are left at $480. I have no information which leads me to conclude that Zurich is any more important than the rest of the consulates I have named. That Horgen may be less important than Zurich or any of these other places I am inclined to think is true.

The truth is that our whole foreign service needs to be overhauled. We have ambassadors, and we have ministers, and we have consuls general, and we have consuls who are drawing pay altogether disproportioned to the service they are rendering or the importance of the places they are filling. It all needs reorganization.

Mr. CULLOM. I hardly think that observation can be applied to the ambassadors.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I will state that I have taken the trouble to investigate the matter, arising from the fact that I am acquainted with the gentleman who is there, and that the fees collected at Zurich are not only three times greater, or nearly so, than those collected at Horgen, but it is the most important point in the whole of Switzerland.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That I admit, but the trouble is that whilst the Senator from California wants to put Zurich up with Horgen, it seems to me a better amendment would be to take Horgen out of the six-hundred-dollar list and put it down to the four-hundred-and-eighty-dollar list. What I mean to say is not that Zurich is not more important than Horgen. The Senator is correct; it is a far more important place, but neither Zurich nor Horgen transacts more business or is of more importance than Berne, Florence, Demerara, Genoa, or Stuttgart.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator is mistaken in that respect. Zurich transacts more business than three of those places, certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There are three of those places where the fees are heavier than at Zurich.

Mr. WHITE. That is true.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not mean to object to the Senator's amendment. I think Zurich is entitled to $600, but I think that a reorganization of the whole consular service ought to be gone into. This is dealing with it by piecemeal instead of dealing with it as a whole.

Mr. WHITE. My friend from Kentucky will bear me out in saying that so far as we have gone amendments of this kind have been allowed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg the Senator to note that I am not objecting to his amendment.

Mr. WHITE. It is only $10 a month increase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On page 22, line 4, I move to strike out "and Zurich" and before the name "Stuttgart" to insert "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest that in line 5, on page 22, it might be well to change "$4,320" to "$4,200."

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator need not move that amendment, as I shall ask permission to have all the totals corrected in accordance with the amendments made.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 22, line 10, after the word "year," to insert "$20,000," and in line 12, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "$25,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Allowance for clerks at consulates, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State at consulates not herein provided for in respect to clerk hire, no greater portion of this sum than $500 to be allowed to any one consulate in any one fiscal year, $20,000: Provided, That the total sum expended in one year shall not exceed the amount appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 14, before the word "hundred," to strike out "ninety-one thousand eight" and insert "ninety-six thousand two;" so as to make the clause read:

Total, $96,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "eighty;" so as to make the clause read:

Expense of providing all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, signs, rent, postage, furniture, statistics, newspapers, freight (foreign and domestic), telegrams, advertising, messenger service, traveling expenses of consular officers and consular clerks, compensation of Chinese writers, and such other miscellaneous expenses as the President may think necessary for the several consulates, consular agencies, and commercial agencies in the transaction of their business, $180,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

Commercial Bureau of American Republics, $20,000: Provided, That any moneys received from sale of the Bureau publications, from rents or other sources may be paid to the disbursing officer of the State Department to be placed to the credit of the Bureau fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. GRAY. On page 5, after line 17, I move to insert as a new paragraph:

To enable the ambassadors of the United States at London, Paris, and Berlin each to employ a stenographer and typewriter at an expense not exceeding $1,500 per annum, $4,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask consent of the Senate that the totals throughout the bill where changed by amendments which have been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole shall be corrected to correspond with the action the Senate has taken upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair hear objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRICE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BRICE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted upon as they are reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, after line 6, to insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That so much of the act approved December 21, 1893, as provides that "any pension heretofore or that may hereafter be granted to any applicant shall be deemed and held by all officers of the United States to be a vested right in the grantee to that extent that payment thereof shall not be withheld or suspended until after due notice to the grantee of not less than thirty days, the Commissioner of Pensions, after hearing all the evidence, shall decide to annul, vacate, modify, or set aside the decision upon which such pension was granted," shall not be held or construed to apply to any case where the pensioner is drawing more than one pension, or the title to the pension has ceased.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 11, after the word "Provided," to strike out:

That the report of such examining surgeons, when filed in the Pension Office, shall be open to the examination and inspection of the claimant or his attorney, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide.

And insert:

That the examining surgeons, after completing the examination of the claimant, shall, on application of the claimant, furnish to said claimant a copy of the report submitted to the Pension Office.

So as to make the clause read:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons for services rendered within the fiscal year 1895, $1,000,000. And each member of each examining board shall, as now authorized by law, receive the sum of $2 for the examination of each applicant whenever five or a less number shall be examined on any one day, and $1 for the examination of each additional applicant on such day: Provided, That if twenty or more applicants appear on one day, no fewer than twenty shall, if practicable, be examined on said day, and that if fewer examinations be then made, twenty or more having appeared, then there shall be paid for the first examinations made on the next examination day the fee of $1 only until twenty examinations shall have been made: Provided further, That no fee shall be paid to any member of an examining board unless personally present and assisting in the examination of applicant: Provided, That the examining surgeons, after completing the examination of the claimant, shall, on application of the claimant, furnish to said claimant a copy of the report submitted to the Pension Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRICE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 2, on page 4, insert:

But the appointment of the clerk to sign official checks, who shall receive the same compensation at each agency as was paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, shall be made by the pension agent without other or further approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate for a few minutes in reference to the general subject.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the passage of this bill. I am in favor, as I have always been, of the appropriation of liberal sums for pensions for the soldiers of the late war. I believe that a large majority of the citizens of the United States are likewise in favor of the payment of liberal pensions to the survivors of the war, and to the widows and children of those who have found rest in the uncurtained tents of death.

The party in which I have had the honor of a long membership, has always maintained that one of the first duties of the American people was the practical recognition, in a material way, of our sacred obligation to the volunteer soldiers of the United States. In a long series of official utterances, this party has always, in its great representative national conventions, pledged itself to the maintenance of a policy of liberality, unlimited by technical or burdensome restrictions in the award and distribution of the fund cheerfully offered to pensioners by the votes of a grateful people. It may add to the inspiration of loyal hearts to recall some of these utterances, and to hear anew what we have said, and what pledges we have made from time to time. The pension policy inaugurated by the Republican party has become so closely incorporated into our governmental system that in quoting these glorious and patriotic expressions I feel almost as if hearing anew the voices of the revered men of the historic past.

At Baltimore, in 1864, the Republican national convention said:

Resolved, That the thanks of the American people are due to the soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy who have periled their lives in defense of the country and in vindication of the honor of the flag; that the nation owes to them some permanent recognition of their patriotism and their valor, and ample and permanent provision for those of their survivors who have received disabled and honorable wounds in the service of the country; and that the memories of those who have fallen in its defense shall be held in grateful and everlasting remembrance.

That, Mr. President, was in 1864, just thirty years ago, and during the very height of the war. The Republican party did not wait until after Lee's surrender, but announced its policy while its defenders were in the field.

At Chicago, in 1868, when Gen. Grant was nominated for President, the Republican platform contained the following pension plank:

Of all who were faithful in the trials of the late war there were none entitled to more especial honor than the brave soldiers and seamen who endured the hardships of campaign and cruise, and imperiled their lives in the service of the country. The bounties and pensions provided by the laws for these brave defenders of the nation are obligations never to be forgotten. The widows and orphans of the gallant dead are the wards of the people—a sacred legacy bequeathed to the nation's protecting care.

During the period between the first and second nominations of Gen. Grant the feeling of the people in favor of liberal pensions continued with added emphasis, and the convention at Philadelphia in 1872 expressed itself as follows:

We hold in undying honor the soldiers and sailors whose valor saved the Union. Their pensions are a sacred debt of the nation, and the widows and orphans of those who died for their country are entitled to the care of a generous and grateful people. We favor such additional legislation as will extend the bounty of the Government to all our soldiers and sailors who were honorably discharged, and who in the line of duty became disabled, without regard to the length of service or the cause of such disability.

Mr. President, it was one of the occasions in my personal history, to which I look back with pride, that I was fortunate enough to participate in the convention which adopted that resolution, and that I was permitted to enjoy the distinguished honor of placing in nomination the patriot and hero, Ulysses S. Grant, who was reëlected to the Presidency upon that platform.

Again in 1876, at Cincinnati, the party of progress reaffirmed its position in the following language:

The pledges which the nation has given to her soldiers and sailors must be fulfilled, and a grateful people will always hold those who imperiled their lives for the country's preservation in the kindest remembrance.

The Republican national convention of 1880 was held at Chicago. This convention fortified the previous position of the party in regard to pensions by the following graphic expression:

The obligations of the Republic to the men who preserved its integrity in the day of battle are undiminished by the lapse of fifteen years since their final victory. To do them honor is and shall forever be the grateful privilege and sacred duty of the American people.

In 1884 the national convention was again held at Chicago, and it again took strong and unmistakable ground in support of the pension system of the party and the country in this language:

The grateful thanks of the American people are due to the Union soldiers and sailors of the late war; and the Republican party stands pledged to suitable pensions for all who were disabled, and for the widows and orphans of those who died in the war. The Republican party also pledges itself to the repeal of the limitations contained in the arrears act of 1879, so that all invalid soldiers shall share alike and their pensions begin with the date of disability and discharge, and not with the date of application.

The convention of 1884 honored itself and honored my State by placing upon its national ticket the name of Gen. John A. Logan, the typical volunteer soldier of America.

In 1888 Chicago was for the third successive time the place of meeting of the national convention, and then and there this plank was placed in the platform:

"The gratitude of the nation to the defenders of the Union can not be measured by laws. The legislation of Congress should conform to the pledge made by a loyal people, and be so enlarged and extended as to provide against the possibility that any man who honorably wore the Federal uniform should become the inmate of an almshouse, or dependent upon private charity. In the presence of an overflowing Treasury it would be a public scandal to do less for those whose valorous service preserved the Government. We denounce the hostile spirit of President Cleveland in his numerous vetoes of measures for pension relief, and the action of the Democratic House of Representatives in refusing even a consideration of general pension legislation."

But in 1892 at Minneapolis was given the last definite expression of the Republican party upon pensions and pension legislation, as follows:

Ever mindful of the services and sacrifices of the men who saved the life of the nation, we pledge anew to the veteran soldiers of the Republic a watchful care and a just recognition of their just claims upon a grateful people.

Mr. President, I have here presented to the Senate the expressions of every Republican national convention held since the beginning of the war of the rebellion, eight in all, and I desire to call serious attention to the glorious history which such a record presents to the world. Now, let us see what has been done to redeem the pledges made in that brilliant record. Has the Congress of the United States given force by law to the promises made by the Republican party?

For a full generation the national policy has been the Republican policy regarding pensions, except in slight and unimportant particulars. The following table shows the number of pensioners and the disbursements for pensions each year for thirty-three years:

On June 30, 1893, there were 966,012 pensioners on the rolls of the Pension Office, and over fifteen hundred millions of dollars had been paid out of the Treasury up to that time in behalf of those pensioners.

Mr. President, after reading such a statement will any man make question of the fact that the Republican party's pledges, solemnly made at every national convention from 1864 to 1892, have been thoroughly and well fulfilled? And will any man make question that the Republican party and its members will in the future pursue the same wise and humane policy as in the past?

It will be instructive just at this time to follow the history of pension legislation for a few moments, and see what that history reveals.

From 1861 to 1875 the Congress was under Republican control, and all legislation upon pensions during that time was Republican legislation. With the latter year the Democrats obtained control of the House of Representatives. In 1878 the effect of Democratic control began to be apparent. The Republican law of February 14, 1871, was amended by the Democratic act of March 9, 1878, so that widows of soldiers of the war of 1812 should lose their pensions upon remarriage; the term of service was reduced from sixty to fourteen days, and the provision which prevented those who had been in rebellion in the late war from receiving pensions was stricken out.

The effect of this was to restore to the rolls the names of all pensioners of the war of 1812 which had been stricken off for participation in, or encouragement of the rebellion. This, with another act approved in 1879, giving three months' extra pay to officers and soldiers of the Mexican war, were some of the measures of that period of Democratic ascendency, and both were intended mainly to benefit persons who lived in the Southern States.

The principal measure of the six years of Democratic control in the House was the "arrears" act. But this was a Republican law, in that it was introduced by a Republican (Cummings of Kansas), was put on its passage by a Republican (Haskell of Kansas), was voted for by 116 Republicans and 48 Democrats in the House, a majority of the Democrats in the House voting against it.

In the Senate there were 27 Republicans and 16 Democrats voting in favor, and the 3 nays were all Democrats. A later Democratic limitation of the arrears was put into an appropriation bill reported by W. A. J. Sparks (Democrat) of Illinois, creating a limitation of less than one year and four months—that is, from March 3, 1879, to July 1, 1880—and that law has remained in force to the present.

Briefly stated, the vote on the "arrears" act was as follows:

Democrats	48	Democrats	61

On January 5, 1885, on motion of a Republican to take up in the House the Mexican pension bill, so amended by the Senate as to confer pensions on disabled soldiers of the late war, and to increase pensions of widows and dependent parents and children, the following vote was had:

For the bill.		Against the bill.
Republicans	72	Republicans	1
Democrats	57	Democrats	84

On the bill increasing widows' pensions from $8 to $12 per month, on February 2, 1886, the following vote was had in the House:

For the bill.		Against the bill.
Democrats	80	Democrats	66

All but two of these 66 Democrats were from the South.

At the same time the Senate voted upon the Senate bill, No. 1886, to pension disabled dependent soldiers, as follows:

Democrats	7	Democrats	14

When this latter bill reached the House it died in committee.

The dependent pension bill was put upon passage under a suspension of the rules January 17, 1887, the vote being:

Democrats	66	Democrats	76

On February 11, 1887, President Cleveland vetoed the bill, and the vote to pass it over the President's objections stood—

For the bill.		Against the bill.
Democrats	37	Democrats	125

Tabulating these votes upon the several measures we find a total—

For the bills.		Against the bills.
Republicans	585	Republicans	1

Shown in detail as follows:

Name of bill.	For the bill.		Against the bill.
	Republicans.	Democrats.	Republicans.	Democrats.
Repeal of arrears limitation	116	48	None	61
Mexican pension, Senate amendment	72	57	1	84
Widows' increase	118	80	None	66
Senate bill, 1886	27	7	None	14
Dependent pension bill	114	66	None	76
Dependent pension bill, over veto	138	37	None	125
Total	585	295	1	426

Let me now present a similar table of the votes upon various pension measures in 1890, which will show:

For the bills.		Against the bills.
Republicans	719	Republicans	1
Democrats	177	Democrats	392

As follows:

Name of bill.	For the bill.		Against the bill.
	Republicans.	Democrats.	Republicans.	Democrats.
Dependent parents, Senate	32	10	None	12
Morrill, 62-year bill	136	34	1	86
Morrill, Cheadle 60-year amendment	143	40	None	71
Morrill-60-year bill	141	38	None	71
Disability, conference, House	117	28	None	56
Disability, conference, Senate	31	3	None	18
Prisoners of war	119	24	None	78
Total	719	177	1	392

Combining the two tables, it will be seen that so far as these reported roll calls show there were:

For the bills.		Against the bills.
Democrats	472	Democrats	818

I will now separate the House and Senate votes upon pensions, as above tabulated, and present the Republican and Democratic standing, by percentage in each body, upon pension legislation. I find that the following is the average respective standing of the two parties in Congress as regards sustaining the soldiers of the late war. That is, in the House, upon the important pension measures of the past few years, the Republicans have furnished 73 per cent and the Democrats 27 per cent of the affirmative votes; while in the Senate the Republicans have furnished 81 per cent and the Democrats 19 per cent of the affirmative votes. Of those voting against the bills, the Democrats have the undivided honor of furnishing about 100 per cent, the entire negative vote—or 818 out of 820 votes.

I should also state that the Mexican pension bill of January 29, 1887, in granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, repealed the provisions of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, so far as they applied to the soldiers of that war. That section of the Revised Statutes prohibited the payment of any pension to any person or to the widow, children, or heirs of any person who had voluntarily engaged in or aided the late rebellion against the United States. The effect of this repeal was to make eligible as pensioners very many who were prominent in the Confederate army, and who are now upon our pension rolls at $8 or $12 per month. I will ask the Secretary to read the following, which appears in the columns of the National Tribune, a newspaper published in this city:

The Secretary read as follows:

MEXICAN PENSION ROLL.—ONE WHICH IS NOT "PURGED," AND IN WHICH THERE ARE NO SUSPENSIONS.

On the Mexican pension roll there are the names of 15,215 survivors and 7,282 widows, and something over 3,000 cases were pending at latest reports. This makes a total of 25,497, or several thousand more men than the United States had in Mexico at any one time during the war.

These all receive either $8 or $12 a month.

Among the names are those of the widow of Gen. Samuel Cooper, a New Yorker by birth, who was Adjutant-General of the United States Army at the outbreak of the war, and used his position to aid the rebels in preparing for the struggle. He resigned his position to become adjutant-general of the Southern Confederacy, and officiated as such until the rebellion collapsed. Mrs. Cooper has been drawing a pension since June 6, 1887.

The widow of Thomas J. ("Stonewall") Jackson, who was next to Lee the most popular commander of the rebel armies.

The widow of Maj. Gen. George E. Pickett, who commanded a division in the rebel army.

The widow of Maj. Gen. Gideon J. Pillow, who commanded a division in the rebel army.

The widow of Lieut. Gen. A. P. Hill, who commanded one of the three corps of Lee's army.

The widow of Sidney Smith Lee, who was dismissed from the Navy for "going over to the enemy," and afterward became a commodore in the rebel navy.

Brig. Gen. James. R. Chalmers, who was Forrest's chief lieutenant.

Maj. Gen. Dabney H. Maury, who commanded the rebel troops at the battle of Chickasaw Bayou.

Hon. S. B. Maxey, late United States Senator from Texas, who has been drawing his pension since May 27, 1887. He was a major-general in the rebel army.

The widows above mentioned are of men who were educated at the Government expense, and afterward fought to destroy the Government. They went on the roll at once, while last April there were pending the claims of 145,520 widows of Union soldiers who had not yet been able to get on the roll

Mr. CULLOM. The law authorizing these pensions was passed in January, 1887, under Mr. Cleveland's first Administration, and most of these names were placed upon the pension rolls during the incumbency of Mr. Cleveland's former Commissioner of Pensions. The effect of this sort of Democratic legislation is rather striking when compared with the suspension or reduction of many thousands of Union soldiers' pensions, which had been made during the first year of Mr. Cleveland's second term.

In the State of Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent in this body, there were between May 1, 1893, and March 1, 1894, a period of ten months, six hundred and eighty-two cases suspended by the Pension Office, and in the same time five hundred and thirty-two cases in which resumption of payment was ordered. It is not my province to show why these pensioners in Illinois were put to the trouble and annoyance of suffering a suspension, carrying with it a stigma of fraud and wrong upon their part, which their subsequent restoration shows was without any reasonable justification.

In the neighboring State of Ohio, in the six months ending September 1, 1893, this Administration suspended 2,000 pensions. The names and residences have been obtained and published. Why should there have been so much greater a proportion of frauds and rascals among Ohio soldiers than in Illinois? It hardly seems probable that the soldiers of my State are three times as honest as those of Ohio. Perhaps my friend, the Administration Senator from Ohio, can furnish some explanation of this disproportionate ratio of evil-disposed soldiers. And then let me call his attention also to the fact that of the nearly 2,000 names of those suspended up to September 1, 1893, in Ohio, a list of 1,323 names restored to the rolls between September 1 and October 30, 1893, was furnished by Hon. John G. Mitchell, pension agent at Columbus, to Hon. James F. Seward, chairman of the Democratic State central committee at Columbus, in time to publish before the election of November 2, 1893, so as to show to the people of Ohio that President Cleveland had hastened to correct the injustice done to the worthy soldiers of Ohio, who, it was claimed, had been suspended by the rascally Republican clerks (?) in the Pension Office.

The matter of dates is somewhat significant in recalling this bit of history. In July and August, 1893, a whirlwind of indignation was sweeping the State of Ohio regarding the action of this Administration in suspending soldiers' pensions by the thousands. An election was to be held in November, and something had to be done. "A necessity is laid upon us," said the politicians. Letters and telegrams flooded the Bureaus, the Departments, and the Executive sanctum. A prominent Democratic Representative warned the Interior Department that unless the wholesale suspending of pensions was stopped forthwith the Republicans would carry the next House of Representatives and sweep the Democrats out of power. "Restore those pensioners, and do it quick!" was the burden of their cry.

Over 1,300 Ohio soldiers were reinstated as quickly as the names could be written. A Deputy Commissioner of Pensions was hurried to the National Military Home at Dayton, Ohio, to explain matters to the soldiers there. But all the frantic haste to recoup the loss of prestige among the Buckeyes was unavailing. Thousands of good, reliable Democratic veterans determined to vote as they shot, and they gave, on that first Tuesday in November, a parting kick to the twin humbugs, Democratic pension reform and Democratic tariff reform in the shape of 80,000 majority for McKinley.

A great deal has been said by officials and others in regard to the frauds upon the Government in relation to pensions as a justification for these arbitrary suspensions. There has been, is now, and always will be a certain proportion of individuals in all classes of society who belong to the criminal element, who will resort to fraud and crime where money can be obtaines by it. In some cases a few individuals have inaugurated schemed for a wholesale looting of the Treasury, and a few men may present a large number of fictitious or fraudulent cases. It would be very strange if such men failed to find a field for their crimes in the Pension Bureau. But it would be utterly false to say that any large percentage of the pensioners are guilty of fraud. Among a vast army which first and last has included perhaps a million and a quarter of actual pensioners, and many more applicants whose claims were rejected, I fully believe that the proportion of crime is not as great as is found in other branches of the public service or in private business.

A few years ago a Democratic Commissioner of the General Land Office began his official career by suspending vast numbers of land entries and in closing to the public the lands of the United States, in violation of the known policy of the Government. He brought ruin and desolation to the homes of thousands of innocent settlers by asserting that fraud permeated the public-land system. The poor settler, the real homesteader of this country, was subjected to such hardships as can hardly be appreciated by those unfamiliar with the subject. That there existed frauds is true, but a very few men were the criminals, and it was the rankest injustice to block the progress of the country by any such bold assumption as characterized the administration of the Land Office in the earlier part of the first Cleveland Administration.

Many parts of the West have not yet recovered from the blows then inflicted, and the wrecking business was only stopped at last by the heroic methods of the then Secretary of the Interior. The action of the present Administration, in so far as the work of suspension and reduction is concerned, presents a parallel to that of the Land Office in 1885–'86, which had to be revoked. The Pension Bureau is just now apparently doing what it can to retrieve the hasty action of its first eight months control, and I am disposed to give it due credit for its present better-considered course. Numbers of the 682 suspensions in Illinois were brought to my notice by letters of the most touching character from the old soldiers themselves, or from the widows or orphans whose support and stay had been summarily taken from them.

I could almost fill a number of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the plaintive and tearful stories sent to me. But I need not quote or read them. Their purport is known in a thousand neighborhoods and places all over Illinois. Everybody has heard the cry, and the common people have seen and felt the woe. And the only defense and explanation which has been made—the only apology offered for the wrong and outrage perpetrated—is that there are many criminals and frauds upon the rolls who should not be there. Conceding this assertion, whence comes the authority for questioning the entire array of pensioners in the United States? Because there is one thief in a community, shall we cast suspicion upon and impute crime to a thousand honest men in the neighborhood? Our Democratic friends who defend these methods of treating soldier veterans, did not hesitate to vote solidly the other day for repealing the election laws under which there had been nearly 7,000 persons prosecuted and 2,000 convicted of election frauds.

They fail to listen to the cry which they know to be true, that the Congressional and other elections in large cities have been "honeycombed by frauds" for years, but they can easily "strain at the gnat" of the frauds upon pensions, which are readily discovered and quickly punished. Their inconsistent course gives color to the suspicion that they do not desire to have pure elections so much as they desire to parcel out money from the Treasury to political special agents for hunting fraud among old soldiers.

I insert a report furnished by the Secretary of the Interior, showing a list of pensioners affected by the action of this Administration. The report does not give the names of the 9,509 pensioners suspended and afterwards reinstated at the same rate.

I will without reading insert it in the body of my speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

The document referred to si as follows:

Mr. CULLOM. The Democratic party has not been less profuse in its professions of sympathy and aid to the soldiers and sailors than has the Republican party. There has always been, however, this vital difference: That the Republicans voted pensions and national aid and have been ready at all times to appropriate every dollar required for carrying out the party's pledges to the Union veteran, while the Democrats have either been indifferent or a majority of them have voted against the pension legislation of this country.

In the campaign of 1864, when they wanted the soldier vote, the Democratic platform said:

Resolved, That the sympathy of the Democratic party is heartily and earnestly extended to the soldiers and sailors of our Army and Navy, who are and have been in the field and on the sea under the flag of our country, and, in the event of its attaining power, they will receive all the care, protection, and regard that the brave soldiers and sailors of the Republic have so nobly earned.

All this was well said, but it was, in the light of subsequent history, a hypocritical untruth.

This bill is for the payment of pensions to surviving soldiers and sailors, and to the widows and children of soldiers and sailors who took a solemn oath upon enlistment to support and maintain the Government of the United States. They enlisted to defend and support this nation, not to support and defend the State of Illinois or the State of New York, or any other State. And the taking of that oath, the mustering into service of two millions of loyal men, meant nothing more nor less than the preservation of the Union and the utter and eternal destruction of the theory of secession and State rights. And that thing those soldiers did. That thing is what we are paying these pensions for to-day.

Mr. President, it is about time to look about us and see where we stand—consider "where we are drifting."

The Constitution and the laws of the United States as they have been interpreted by the highest authority, and their enforcement at the point of the sword and at the cannon's mouth, certainly meant something. If they meant anything they meant that when Gen. Lee gave his sword to Gen. Grant at Appomattox State rights was dead for all time. Its supporters had thrown down the gage of battle at Fort Sumter, and when they laid down their arms in 1865 the question was settled. And by that famous apple tree there was cast to the four winds the doctrine of secession, and the word nation took a more prominent place in our vocabulary.

We are voting a hundred and fifty millions a year now to pay the men and the widows and heirs of the men who strangled State's rights and gave us a nation and a flag.

I will take occasion to remark here in relation to the present situation in our country, growing out of a conflict between labor and capital, which has culminated in riot, destruction of property, and loss of life, that I am gratified to recognize by my voice the energy, courage, and patriotism of the President of the United States, supported by the law-abiding and liberty-loving men of the country without respect to party, in his efforts to enforce the laws and crush out all lawless attempts to interfere with the business of the National Government or with the commerce of the people among the several States. This is a Government of law; it is a free Government; but freedom does not mean the right to burn, destroy, to commit crime. The situation of affairs for the last ten days has produced great anxiety in the minds of every patriotic citizen of the Republic.

I deplore the fact that such lawlessness should occur anywhere in the land, and especially in the Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent. However violent and threatening the situation, I believe it will soon be over and peace and good order will resume sway.

Mr. President, the burdens of the National Government rest so lightly upon the shoulders of the people, and they so seldom have occasion to even witness its power that when it is called upon to use force in the execution of the laws, a question is raised as to its right to do so. Mr. President, the national authority is paramount on every inch of American soil in the enforcement of its laws. Congress passes laws. Until they are set aside by the courts or repealed it is the duty of the President to see that they are faithfully executed. He is not called to say by your leave to governors or anybody else. But, Mr. President, I will return to the original line of my remarks.

We of this side of the Chamber are constantly charged with fighting the war over again—with bringing up unpleasant reminiscences. What is the fact? Who is responsible for such things? Are not the pensions and the pensioners always with us? Who suspends and harrasses and annoys them? What party is it that avows constant loyalty to the soldier and seizes every opportunity to give two-thirds of its votes against them?

The Democratic management of the Pension Office has been characterized as a "two-cent" policy. It minimizes everything the soldier has done; questions what he says; and holds him up to make proof of unimportant technicalities. It postpones, delays, suspects, and hesitates. A prominent Republican in another place said recently that he did not think an apothecary's scale should be used in measuring the gratitude and thankfulness of this nation and of the American people to those who preserved the Republic and made possible its greatness and wealth. And he spoke truly.

In the Fifty-first Congress a Democratic Congressman (now governor of a great State) said in his place in the House:

> I give it as my deliberate judgment, I state it as a fact, that no people on earth, since governments were instituted among men, have been so despoiled and plundered in the name of patriotism and under the guise of pension laws as have been the people of the United States.

Mr. President, has the sum of $1,500,000,000, which this people have paid to the sick and wounded and crippled remnants of the struggle which saved the Union, rid the country of the cursed institution of slavery, and crushed State rights out of existence, been paid grudgingly by our people? Shall it be said that because a few human vultures may have profited from the money appropriated for a sacred purpose that therefore it is a system of spoliation and plunder? I despise and denounce such an assumption. And I glory in the sentiment which inspired the eloquent young Iowan [Mr. DOLLIVER] who said in reply:

> I could not repress a feeling of indignation as I listened to these odious charges and heard the necessities of the veterans sneered at by Democratic members on the floor of this Congress. And I say to the gentleman from Missouri, and to you gentlemen, that the need which stands in pathetic eloquence behind the pressing urgency of the demands of the old soldiers of the United States is no badge of dishonor.

But, Mr. President, I commenced these remarks mainly for the purpose of illustrating the fact that the Republican party is responsible for our entire system of pension legislation, and that any claim of the Democratic party for either credit or responsibility for it is untrue.

There have been a few Democrats who have occasionally disregarded the dictation of party leaders and have supported with discriminating liberality the interests of pensioners. There are some to-day, and in this Congress, who have indignantly rebuked the Department officials and the party managers for maintaining a policy of delay, annoyance, and trouble toward the pensioned soldiers. Gen. DANIEL E. SICKLES and Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, both now members of the House of Representatives, are shining examples of propriety upon this question, amid a rampant majority of unfriendly Democrats.

Mr. President, a few days ago the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution offered by myself and adopted by the Senate, transmitted to the Senate the following statement, showing that there is approximately $24,385,400 of the appropriation for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, still unused and unexpended in the Treasury of the United States.

Before I proceed further I desire to ask leave to insert this document, which is very brief, in the body of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Leave will be granted if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The document referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, June 22, 1894.

SIR: I am in receipt of Senate resolution of the 20th instant—

"That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate what amount of the appropriation for the payment of pensions will remain unexpended at the close of the fiscal year 1894."

In response thereto I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, to whom the matter was referred for report, containing the desired information.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, June 21, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate of the United States, dated June 20, 1894, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate what amount of the appropriation for the payment of pensions will remain unexpended at the close of the fiscal year 1894.

In reply I have the honor to submit the following statement:

On the 20th day of June there was an unexpended balance remaining in the United States Treasury amounting to $23,485,000. It is estimated that of the credits now in the hands of the several United States pension agents, $900,000 will be covered into the United States Treasury at the close of the present fiscal year.

This amount ($900,000) is an approximate estimate for the reason that an exact statement can not be made of the amounts that will be paid for pensions during the remainder of the present month.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the payment of pensions will approximate the sum of $24,385,000.

Very respectfully,

D. I. MURPHY,
Acting Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. CULLOM. In this connection I submit an editorial from an Illinois journal:

> At the end of the fiscal year, last Saturday, the Pension Bureau covered into the United States Treasury $25,000,000 which was left unexpended of the pension appropriations for the last year. Instead of this money representing a saving, as the Democrats claim, it is blood money, every dollar of it; and if it could be possible to present to the public the story of the suffering which its unjust withholding from old soldiers in want, whose applications for pensions have been purposely unacted upon in order that this money might not be paid out, it would make even a Democrat blush for the Administration that could deliberately plan and carry out such a heartless and unpatriotic policy.
> There is another side of the question, too, that is likely to be heard from. What right has an executive bureau of the Government to refuse to carry out the law? Congress appropriated the money to pay pensions. Senator CULLOM offered a resolution, which was passed, instructing the Commissioner of Pensions to report to the Senate the amount of the pension appropriation that remained unexpended at the close of the fiscal year. When that report is received the Democrats may look out for some plain talk on their pension policy.—Carlinville Republican.

The fact that this immense sum, nearly twenty-five millions of dollars, has been withheld from the thousands of beneficiaries for whom it was intended, is not chargeable to the Commissioner of Pensions, nor to the Secretary of the Interior, but it is chargeable against the Democratic party, as a matter of party policy. The Democratic party has never passed a bounty law, nor a pension law for the pensioning of Union soldiers, unless it had coupled with it some provision which should principally benefit persons who had engaged in armed rebellion against the United States.

It has come to be regarded in the South as an obligation which can not be ignored or evaded, due from Senators and Representatives in Congress to their constituents, that they shall secure Federal offices for as many ex-Confederate officers and soldiers as possible. It is a matter of public knowledge, reported in the public prints, that a Democratic citizen of Arkansas, who desires to succeed in this body one of the honorable Senators from that State, gives as a valid and sufficient reason why the sitting Senator should be retired the statement that he has failed to recognize the just wants and demands of ex-Confederate officers and soldiers by having them appointed to fat and lucrative Federal places under this Administration.

This would not be regarded in some places as a very serious blunder, but when the Senator whose course has been thus challenged comes out publicly and in indignant denial of the charge, furnishes the names of a large number of rebel officers and soldiers for whom he has obtained places in Washington and elsewhere, it would seem to be conclusive proof of his loyalty to the lost cause for a generation after its funeral.

Can anyone doubt that in a Congress composed so largely of Democrats who thus recognize the obligations they owe to the memory of Jefferson Davis, there will be a general approval of the saving of $25,000,000 from the pension appropriation, which Governor Stone, of Missouri, claims "has been plundered and despoiled from the people in the name of patriotism under the guise of pension laws?"

Can anyone wonder, when they see this Democratic determination to harass and annoy and injure the surviving veterans of the Army of the United States, existing side by side with the policy of glorifying the efforts of those who strove to destroy the Union, that the pensioner's hopes fail within him and he cries out, "My country, why hast thou forsaken me?"

The Democratic management upon pensions, as upon almost every other question of public interest, is one of obstruction and destruction. The Democratic party casts a dark shadow upon the integrity and propriety of whatever it attempts to do. When it lays its hand upon an interest or touches a public measure, that interest is palsied or that measure is tainted. Its success at the polls in 1892 struck the business of the country as with a black frost.

In Hawaii it crawled in the dirt and pulled the flag with it. On the tariff its action, so far, has been so destructive that the industrial interests of the land have been swept as by fire. To the ballot stuffer and election thief it has offered a premium. And with all this, it proffers to the American soldier the cold victuals of the tramp and pauper.

Can it go further? Let the future answer.

Mr. President, I desire to comment a little upon the document I hold in my hand. It is a report from the Secretary of the Interior in response to a resolution passed by the Senate, and is made up of lists of persons who have been suspended and reinstated, or who have been suspended or reduced, or who are now being suspended, but whose cases apparently are not entirely disposed of, and also of those entirely dropped from the rolls.

I notice in looking over this document that the changes in the Pension Office have been conducted on a kind of cheese-paring business. Take, for instance, two pages of the document which I have before me. I find here twenty-one cases where pensioners were drawing $18 a month who have been reduced $1 each. It seems to me that that was a tremendous effort on the part of these numerous special agents, who have been traveling over the country and trying to find some fault with the pensioners and the pension system to hunt up all this vast number of persons, and while they are good soldiers, while they are entitled to pensions, to cut them off just a little, in order to make a record in behalf of the Democratic policy.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that is too small a business to be encouraged by anybody, and, least of all, by a great political organization. It seems to me, also, that it ought to be stopped. If there are any thieves drawing pensions, take their pensions away; but to go over the whole list, neighborhood by neighborhood, county by county, and State by State, all over the United States, examine every man and reduce his pension 50 cents, or 75 cents, or $1, or $2 in order to make a record, seems to me to be an outrage upon the soldiers themselves, which ought not to be tolerated by the party in power.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that other imperative duties have prevented me from making as careful and comprehensive an examination of the present status of the pension question as I had intended to do. It is a question of vital importance to our people, and especially to the brave men who fought the battles of the Union, and whose shattered and rapidly depleting ranks tell the story of their sufferings and their sacrifices. They fought, and many of them died, in defense of the flag and the Constitution, and they and their dependents have a rightful claim upon the sympathy and protection of those who make and administer the laws of the country.

On the 4th day of September, 1893, I introduced a bill (S. 834) supplemental to the act of June 27, 1890, designed to protect those on the pension roll from the then announced purpose of the Democratic Administration to suspend and drop from the list many who were drawing pensions, such action to be taken under pretense of "purging the roll."

I ask permission to incorporate the bill in my remarks without reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Permission to do so will be granted if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (S. 834) supplemental to an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the act of June 27, 1890, by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions, and in the rating of pensions thereunder, all claimants showing a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, and which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support from such manual labor, in such a degree as would be rated, under former laws and the rules and regulations of the Pension Office existing at the date of the passage of said act of June 27, 1890, at or above $6 per month, shall be rated proportionally in the same manner as like disabilities of service origin are proportionally rated; and all claimants showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, shall be rated at $12 per month.

SEC. 2. That whenever, in consideration of pension claims under the act of June 27, 1890, the claimant has shown that he is disabled by more than one wound, injury, or disease pensionable under said act, the accumulated degree of disability arising from all of said separate disabilities shall be the measure of the rating of the pension granted as provided in the preceding section.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Pensions shall have power, as heretofore, to establish at points most convenient for pensioners and applicants for pension examining boards of three surgeons each, for the examination of applicants for pension. In selecting the members for said board surgeons having had military or naval service in the Army or Navy of the United States shall be preferred for appointment as far as practicable: Provided, however, That such boards shall be constituted as far as practicable of surgeons who belong to different political parties.

SEC. 4. That whenever the certificate of a board of examining surgeons shall show that a claimant for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, is suffering from disabilities which, in their opinion, probably resulted from the vicious habits of the claimant, such case shall be placed in the hands of a special examiner of the Pension Bureau, who shall make an impartial examination into the facts of the case, at which special examination the claimant shall have full opportunity of being present, confronting and cross-examining the witnesses against him, and of introducing witnesses in his own behalf. When the report of the board of examining surgeons shall show that the disabilities found are, in their opinion, the result of causes not referable to the claimant's vicious habits, such disabilities shall be presumed to be resultant from pensionable causes.

SEC. 5. That except in case of established fraud, no pension shall be suspended, withheld, withdrawn, or reduced, except after ninety days' written notice served upon the pensioner, and a full and impartial hearing and investigation had upon sworn testimony: Provided, however, That the certificate of a duly appointed medical examining board may be used in evidence without the same being verified by the oaths of the members of such board signing the same.

Mr. GALLINGER. The effect of the enactment into law of section 1 of the above referred to measure will be to cause applicants for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, to be rated by analogy with equivalent disabilities and rates, in existence under the old or general law at the date of the passage of such act of June 27, 1890, and when upon examination an applicant for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, is found to be disabled in such a degree as would be rated under the old or general pension law and the rules and regulations of the Pension Office, at or above $6 per month, he will be rated proportionately as though his disabilities were incurred in the service, and as though he were making application for pension under the old or general law as contradistinguished from said act of June 27, 1890, and if his condition upon examination shows a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, he would be rated at $12 per month, or the maximum rate under the said act.

This would be a departure from the present practice of the Pension Office, which requires that an applicant for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, should show such a condition of disability as would entitle him to $30 per month under the old or general law, in order to be entitled to the maximum rate of $12 per month allowed by the said act of June 27, 1890. Whereas under this provision he will receive $12 per month if under the old law he would for same disability be rated at any rate from $12 to $30 per month and for disabilities ratable at pensionable degrees less than $12 per month—proportionately from $12 down to $6 per month.

The effect of section 2 of said act would be to give the approval of the statute to a recent ruling of the Commissioner of Pensions to the effect that where upon examination an applicant for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, is found to be disabled by more than one wound, injury, or disease pensionable under the said act, the accumulated or sum total of the degree of disability arising from all of said separate disabilities shall be considered in fixing the measure or total of the rating of the pension granted. Thus, for example, if the degree of disability to give the maximum rate (or $12 per month under the said act) is fixed at twelve-eighteenths, and upon examination an applicant is found to be suffering from rheumatism and disease of kidneys, and is rated by the examining board at four-eighteenths for rheumatism and four-eighteenths for disease of kidneys, under section 2 of this proposed measure the Commissioner of Pensions would rate the said applicant eight-eighteenths, or $8 per month.

Under section 3 the Commissioner of Pensions will have the power to establish boards of examining surgeons at various points convenient for pensioners and applicants for pension, and said section is designed merely to enact into law a custom which has prevailed in the Department for some time of making such boards nonpartisan, or of appointing at least one of the three members of said board from the party of the political faith opposite to that of the Administration so appointing. This, as before stated, has been the practice of the Pension Office to a considerable extent for some years past, and should be sanctioned by law.

The effect of section 5 will be to prevent the rejection of an application for pension upon the mere obiter dicta of an examining board upon the question as to the habits of the applicant. In the event that such examining board report as their judgment that the disabilities alleged by the applicant as ground for pension are the result of vicious habits upon his part, the applicant will be afforded an opportunity to rebut such opinion by the testimony of neighbors or fellow-workmen or of those having knowledge of his private life and character, by summoning said witnesses before a special examiner of the Pension Bureau, as is now the case in claims where doubt exists from any cause as to the merits. It also, when the certificate of examining surgeons does not show origin in vicious habits, raises the presumption in favor of claimant.

Section 5 prohibits the suspension, withdrawal, or reduction of a pension except after ninety days' written notice upon the pensioner and a full and impartial hearing and investigation upon sworn testimony, provided of course the pensioner desires to avail himself of this latter privilege. The enactment of this section of the act will prevent the wholesale suspension of pensioners and the calling upon them to establish by medical or other testimony the fact that they should not have been suspended, thus having the proof postdating the conviction instead of antedating it. The effect of the enactment of this section will confirm a pensioner's right to his pension and fix by law the steps necessary to be taken to deprive him thereof, as well as the logical order or sequence in which such steps must be taken, and giving him the right, in any case where it is alleged that he is no longer disabled, to be examined by an examining board to determine the question as to whether his disability has ceased in a pensionable degree.

If that bill, or one similar in terms, could be enacted into law it would greatly facilitate the just administration of the beneficent statute of June 27, 1890, and would prevent a repetition of the abuses which have marked the administration of pension legislation by the present Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions, but unfortunately the bill is quietly resting in a Democratic committee room, from which it will probably never emerge.

At the time that bill was introduced I addressed the Senate at some length, claiming (statute law and Department decisions being quoted to sustain my contention) that the Commissioner of Pensions had no legal right or authority to suspend or annul pensions except in cases where the element of fraud could be clearly shown.

Since that time the Commissioner has, I think, on several different occasions, informed the country as to the policy he proposed to pursue in dealing with the matter of suspending and dropping pensioners from the roll, but I am of opinion that no one can now possibly determine what the policy of the Pension Bureau is toward the defenders of the country, and especially toward those who were pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890. Certain it is that constantly since that time the old soldiers have been harshly dealt with, and thousands of them are now suffering for the small comforts that a continuance of the pensions granted under former Administrations would have brought to them.

The newspapers have recently informed us that the Commissioner of Pensions has issued an order modifying a prior order, and providing that hereafter no investigation shall be deemed necessary except in cases where fraud has been shown. That is precisely what I contended for nearly one year ago, but during the time that has elapsed thousands of pensions have been suspended without adequate cause, and much needless suffering has thus been inflicted upon the soldiers. It is said that the new order will cause the return to the files of a large number of cases now under investigation—indeed it is estimated that many thousands will be called in. The claim is made that the order was promulgated in the interest of better business methods, and I venture to express the hope that at last some measure of justice is to be done the soldiers in this regard.

This whole business of suspending pensions except in cases where fraud manifestly existed has been utterly cruel and unjustifiable. Why, if a man steals we give him a fair trial, furnish him with counsel, provide him with every opportunity to establish his innocence, and punish him only after his guilt is fully established. If he commits murder, we try him with great deliberation, throw the whole burden of proof upon the Government, and give him the chance for appeal after appeal. But the Pension Bureau treats these battered old veterans more harshly than we treat thieves and murderers. Without trial, without warning, without even a charge, it has suspended the weakest and most helpless of them by the thousand, and required them to make good their claims by the collection of fresh evidence, a task necessarily made more difficult with the lapse of every year. And then the editors of Democratic newspapers speak of the proceeding with complacency and praise, and deprecate all criticism of it. Is it surprising that some of these shattered old men, bewildered by their disasters, have taken their own lives, while others have gone crazy and others still have sought the almshouse?

Recently a Democratic newspaper of this city published the following:

> The attacks on Commissioner Lochren show that the pension shark is still a power at Washington, but the people know very well that when pensions are costing over $150,000,000 a year at least a third of it represents robbery.

That is the solemn utterance of a Democratic newspaper at the capital of the nation, and from similar utterances from other sources it may fairly be taken as the opinion of the Democratic party. The charge is that at least one-third of all the pensioners on the rolls are frauds, not entitled to any pension at all; that is, one in three, three in every nine, five in every fifteen, eight in every twenty-four, thirty-three in every hundred represent robbery of the Government and the people, and that of the $150,000,000 and over of money paid to pensioners, at least one-third of it, or over $50,000,000 annually, is stolen outright. This is the deliberate statement of a newspaper in the city of Washington. Of course it is a base lie and libel, but it is nevertheless a common Democratic charge against the pensioners, and shows the Democratic opinion of them.

As bearing on the administration of the Pension Bureau since the incoming of Mr. Cleveland's second term, I beg to direct attention to a recent letter from the Commissioner of Pensions in response to a Senate resolution of April 14, 1894, to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has adverted. It is a remarkably instructive document, and I regret that it is too voluminous to be inserted entire in my remarks. From it we learn that the number dropped from the roll by Commissioner Lochren is 2,671, the number reduced 3,014, the number reinstated at former rate 9,509, and the number still suspended, 326.

Thus it appears that the number of cases adjudicated and allowed by former Commissioners which the present Commissioner saw fit to suspend and investigate, aggregates 15,520. Out of this number 9,509 were restored to the roll after investigation, and 2,671 were permanently dropped. It is especially interesting to note the mighty work done by this reform Administration in the matter of reducing pensions. After expending much time and money, and putting the old soldiers to great annoyance and inconvenience, hundreds of cases are reduced from $8 to $6, and many others from $12 to $10 and $8. In some instances reductions have been made from $8 to $4, in others from $6 to $4, and occasionally from $6, $8, or $12 to $2. Those reductions were made in pensions granted under the act of June 27, 1890. Under the general law the reductions were more sweeping, and a considerable saving of expenditure was made. Many cases have been reduced from $72 to $50 and $30, while I notice one reduced from $72 to $17. Another case is reduced from $50 to $4, and still another from $16 to $2. Several are reduced from $31.25 to $30, and others from $18 to $17, showing the nice discrimination that this reform Administration practices when it focuses its mighty intellect on the question of reversing the action of some former Administration on the pension question. But why spend time in analyzing these figures? To my mind it is a record that no political party can feel proud of, and beyond a peradventure it will prove to be a serious matter to those who are responsible for it.

It is to me a matter of regret that this record has been made in a bureau presided over by an old soldier. Commissioner Lochren was a brave and patriotic soldier. His administration of the Pension bureau in all other respects is most admirable. This is the one blot upon an otherwise honorable and commendable record. How is it to be accounted for?

Mr. President, it should constantly be borne in mind that Commissioner Lochren is subordinate to the Secretary of the Interior and to the President of the United States. He is but an administrative officer, subject to their superior authority. The record of discharges of old soldiers from the Interior Department, to make places for callow youths from the State of Georgia, shows the estimation in which the veteran element is held by the Secretary of the Interior. "The old soldier racket is about played out" has more than once been uttered in that Department, and tells the story of the outrages and wrongs that are being committed on men who helped to save the Government from overthrow.

But the chief agent and instrumentality of this wretched business is no less a person than the President of the United States. His hostility to the soldiers of the Republic has been shown over and over again. His coarse and brutal vetoes of innumerable private pension bills and his veto of the dependent pension bill are not forgotten by the American people. In his heart there seems to be no soft spot for the men who made it possible for him to be President of the United States. He has sneered at, slandered, and reviled the soldiers of the Union Army, and beyond a doubt his hand of authority and power is back of all this effort to disturb the pension roll and to take from the pensioners that which they earned amid the strife and desolation of the battlefield.

And what, Mr. President, has been gained by all this disturbance and annoyance to the soldiers? A recent communication from the Acting Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Murphy, tells us that $24,385,000 is to be saved from the last pension appropriation and covered into the Treasury of the United States; and Democratic newspapers boastingly announce that this is one of the grandest achievements of modern political history. These millions have been saved by dropping names from the rolls, by reducing others, by rejecting a large proportion of new cases, by postponing action on other meritorious claims, and by allowing minimum rates to those who have been admitted to pension.

That is the record and there is no escape from it. It is barely possible that the Republican party was too generous toward the men who fought the nation's battles, but even if so it was erring in a good cause. Statistics show that under Republican administrations eighty-three out of every one hundred cases adjudicated resulted in the granting of pensions, while seventeen out of every one hundred were rejected. Under Democratic administration of the same laws seventy-two out of every one hundred have been rejected, and only twenty-eight out of every one hundred have been allowed. The difference is so great as to be startlingly instructive, and I commend it to the consideration of both sides of this Chamber.

But we are told that nearly $25,000,000 have been "saved" to the Government in the last fiscal year in the administration of the pension laws. Thank Heaven the Republican party is not responsible for this saving. Think of it! Twenty-five million dollars taken from the old soldiers and their dependents; taken from the channels of commerce and trade, and restored to the coffers of this rich and powerful Government! There was a time, Mr. President, in the history of the Republic when this would not have been done; a time when all the revenues of the country would gladly have been given to the soldiers in pensions if they could have pledged themselves to save the Union and to bring back the flag without a star erased.

They fought the battles of the Republic, restored the Union, reëstablished our nationality, compelled obedience to our Constitution, and floated the flag over every section of our common country. Theirs was a mighty task, and right bravely did they perform it. It is too early to forget their heroism and their suffering, or to brand them, as they have been branded in certain quarters, as mercenaries and perjurers.

Beyond a doubt $25,000,000 have been saved to the Government, but think of the loss in respect for the nation and in patriotic admiration for our Government that must necessarily result. As the New York Press has well said, this so-called saving has been accomplished by a wicked warfare on the old soldiers, their widows and their orphans. It has been achieved by taking advantage of every loophole afforded by technicalities in the pension laws; by arbitrarily and unjustifiably suspending the pensions of thousands of brave veterans who depended upon their meager pittance for a livelihood; by making new and strained interpretations of the statutes, always against the pensioner, and by remorselessly cutting down or cutting off every pension for the reduction or the withholding of which hatred to the veteran could invent the shadow of a pretext.

The people want no "saving" effected by tarnishing the national honor, violating the plighted faith of the Republic, and robbing the men who gave their youth and their strength in defense of American unity and human freedom. The voters of the United States have decreed that an honorable provision should be made for those who served their country faithfully at the peril of their own lives. They have declared through the statutes enacted by their elected representatives that the widows and orphans of loyal veterans should be treated as wards of the nation. And they will inflict stern punishment at the polls upon the disloyal politicians and the unpatriotic party who are endeavoring to force the crippled Union soldier into pauperism and compel his children to beg their bread.

Not only in the matter of pensions, but also in the matter of employment, has the Union soldier fared badly under this Administration. In reference to that matter I am glad of an opportunity to quote the words of a brave Democratic soldier in defense of his comrades. At a recent reunion of the Third Army Corps, Gen. SICKLES, among other things, said:

> I think the atmosphere of Washington would be better if there were army corps reunions here oftener. Somewhat to my surprise since coming to Washington as a public man, one of my chief occupations has been to defend the defenders of the Union, and to keep them from being put out of what I consider their just positions. I had been in the city but a little while when a man came to me from the navy-yard, from which he said he had been discharged without cause. I examined his papers and found that he was one of my old men, who had been with me through twelve battles. I looked the matter up in the Department, and though there was nothing else against the old fellow, it was said that he had voted for Harrison at the last election. And I just said to the head of his Bureau: "As long as that man was with me during the war, and through all of those twelve battles, I never asked him what his politics was. And I think it is a little too late to commence now. To my mind, any man who has been through the Army or Navy and honorably discharged has a right to any politics he chooses, I don't care even if it is Coxeyism." That case was only the beginning of the work I have had to do, and since then I have been called upon to defend about three cases of the same sort each month.

In alluding to what Gen. SICKLES said, one of the most accomplished newspaper writers at the capital a few months ago wrote as follows to one of the leading papers of the country:

> Apropos to what Gen. SICKLES had to say, I have a case that is peculiarly painful to me to mention. On last Saturday a friend of mine, Maj. Ben Worrell, who in the war was an officer in a New Jersey regiment and lost a leg, shot himself through the heart on the steps of the Treasury Department. Up to January last he had been a clerk in the Department for nineteen years. Secretary Carlisle's son Logan, who is the Chief Clerk of the Department, discharged him to make room for a younger man, and one who had done some political service in the cause of Kentucky Democracy. Worrell tried to make a living in private life, but found he was fitted for nothing within his reach. In a moment of depression he ended his life. It is a very sad case.

Yes, Mr. President, that was a very sad case, and I am informed that it is one of nine suicides of old soldiers who have been dismissed from office by this Administration to make places for men most of whom know of the war of the rebellion simply as a matter of history. It is not only a sad, but a disgraceful record.

As bearing on the matter of employment of veterans in the public service, let me direct attention to a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, under date of May 28, 1894, in response to a Senate resolution, to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] adverted in his speech. It is needless to say that no pretence is made in that Department to administer either the civil-service law in its spirit as regards the employés in general, or the statutory provision relating to the veteran soldiers. The former is shown by the fact that while in that Department 104 employés had been dismissed from the State of New York, 81 from Pennsylvania, and 74 from Ohio, only 6 were dismissed from Georgia; but when it came to appointments New York got 38, Pennsylvania 32, Ohio 33, and Georgia 106.

As regards the treatment of the old soldiers, the record is one of disgrace and shame. Of the 876 dismissals 185 were soldiers, while 130 more soldiers were reduced and 32 resigned by request, making a total of 347. On the other hand, only 46 soldiers were appointed and 70 received promotions. And what is true of the Interior Department applies to every other Department of the Government.

In the Department of Agriculture I am informed that the only two ex-soldiers there employed who had lost limbs in the service have been dismissed, while in the Weather Bureau 12 or 15 Union soldiers have shared the same fate.

In the Treasury Department the same process has been going on, dismissals and reductions of soldiers being the order of the day. As showing the iniquity of the system I quote from a letter in the Chicago Daily News from the pen of Hon. William E. Curtis:

> A singular incident occurred in one of the Departments. One of the oldest clerks, whose duties require long experience and technical skill, and who bears the honorable scars of a Union soldier, was called to the office of the chief clerk and asked to sign a letter that had been prepared for him. It was addressed to the head of the Department, and requested him to reduce the signer from the fourth grade, which pays $1,800 a year, to the first grade, which pays $1,200, ostensibly a voluntary surrender of one-third of his salary. The clerk declined to sign the letter, although he was told that such a measure was necessary to save him from dismissal. He responded with indignation that he had been in the Department twenty-seven years without reprimand, and that he would stand on his record. Later in the day he received his peremptory discharge, and carried it home with the air of a man who is willing to die, but not to surrender.
> The next morning things had a different aspect. He is 60 years old. He had no property except the little house in which he lived, worth perhaps $6,000, and about $300 in the savings bank. There is no prospect of securing other employment, and he has six mouths to feed and six persons to clothe, including an invalid daughter, who requires constant medical attention. Another daughter is a widow entirely dependent upon him for support, with two little children.
> The old soldier surrendered. He sought a friend through whose inter-

cession he was able to have the dismissal recalled and secure a reinstatement at $1,000 a year. The clerk who takes his place at $1,800 is a young man from Georgia, unmarried, dissipated, and inexperienced. He came into the office about six months ago at a salary of $1,000, was made assistant to the old clerk, who tried to teach him his duty, but was unable to make much progress because of the young man's indifference and inattention. The latter spent most of the day telling his fellow-clerks of his flirtations and dissipations. The two clerks have now changed places. The young man is the head of the room and draws the $1,800 a year. The old man is his assistant and gets $1,000. The young man still tells of his flirtations and dissipations, and the old man does the work and thinks of his daughters and grandchildren at home.

But why prolong the recital. I have here a bundle of letters showing the hardships and wrongs imposed upon pensioners by the harsh rulings and illegal actions of the Pension Bureau. Of many of them I have personal knowledge, and know that the complaints are well founded. But I can do no more than call attention to the matter. The Government is in the hands of the Democratic party, and they must settle with the soldiers sooner or later, either by fair treatment in the Pension Bureau or at the ballot box. The men who fought to save the Government will fight for the preservation of their rights when the opportunity offers.

Mr. President, I do not know whether the appropriations carried in this bill are sufficient or not. They probably are, but I take it that it matters little whether they are adequate or inadequate. If they are not sufficient pensions can be suspended and reduced until the point is reached where the appropriations will cover the expenditures. It has been demonstrated that this can easily be done. Two hundred and fifty-one million dollars have been "saved," to use the language of our Democratic friends, in the past year. Very likely many millions will be "saved" out of this appropriation.

The record of the past year shows that the appropriation may be made as small as you please and the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions will see to it that "the punishment is made to fit the crime." There is no difficulty in the way. "The old-soldier racket is about played out," according to the teachings of modern Democracy, and until the Republican party is again restored to power, the old soldier must fight his battles as best he can. It is hard and cruel, but party exigency and party folly have apparently decreed that it shall be so.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I have given a good deal of attention to the subject of pensions. It seemed quite natural that when I came into the Senate that class of interests should be to some extent referred to me. I am the senior in age and in rank of members of the Senate who were in the Army of the Union. I commanded a great many troops during the war. I commanded a regiment, a brigade, a division, an army corps, a department. Until I took the command of a department in 1865 I had never performed sedentary duty of any kind whatever. I had been in the field constantly. My acquaintance among the volunteer officers and soldiers I suppose was quite as extensive as that of any other man in the country. I took a regiment into the field made up of my friends and the sons of my friends. My regiment was composed of one company from each of ten counties, counties in which I had practiced law for many years. Perhaps I knew more of the men who served with me than any other colonel who left Illinois knew of the men under him.

I feel that the claims of the soldiers to just and reasonable pensions are as well founded as are the claims of those who loaned or advanced money for the purposes of the Government. They have not the sanction of law until allowed, but they have the moral claim of those who suffered in consequence of their service, which is a claim of the very highest character. I have not at any time discovered a disposition on the part of any party in this country to evade the fair and just claims of the soldiers. On the contrary, I have found on both sides a remarkable disposition to run a race to get the good will of the old soldiers. I have heard Republicans say they are the friends of the soldier, and I have known Democrats to do their best to outvie them.

As an illustration of what I mean, I will state that when I came into the Senate I found a very active and efficient member of the Committee on Pensions, whose name I need not mention. I soon became acquainted with him, and one day I introduced by request a bill to remove the limitations of arrears of pensions. It was referred to the Committee on Pensions, I believe. When I went into the committee room this gentleman, who was not so old as I am, a stout, burly man, said, "Why did you introduce that bill?" I said, "I was asked to do it." He asked, "How much do you think it will cost?" I said, "A hundred million dollars." He said, "It will cost $200,000,000." I said, "The committee will dispose of it." "Dispose of it," said he; "it will go back into the Senate and you will have to vote for it." He went on then to name a number of Senators on both sides who would not only vote for it, but would make speeches in advocacy of it.

In fact, it has been a race among politicians as to which shall be the friend of the soldier. My colleague, for example, is a better friend of the soldier by a good deal than I am. It is true that when there was occasion for joining the society of the soldiers and putting on the uniform, my colleague would not do it. That reminds me of a story of a man who made a bet at a show. One man said that he could squeal more like a pig than the pig himself could. They put the man and the pig in a tent, and both squealed; and the judges gave the award against the pig. [Laughter.]

My colleague is ardently and passionately in love with the soldiers. If the old soldiers had any real grievance, there are men here who would mention their grievance, and they would point out where the grievance lies. I think my colleague has demonstrated his feelings. He spoke of Hawaii and the tariff. It seems not that he loves the soldiers so well, but he hates the Democrats worse. It furnishes a pretext for an attack upon the Democratic party.

It has been one of the misfortunes of this country that the question of proper pensions to soldiers has never received that deliberate care to which it is entitled and which it ought to have had. We have made it the subject of attack and complaint, and we have taunted each other in that direction.

But do Senators know who is the present Commissioner of Pensions? When I came to Washington after the accession of Mr. Cleveland, I went to him and said, "I feel more interest in the position of Commissioner of Pensions than I do in any other office at your gift." After the most careful examination, after canvassing many men my mind reverted to a distinguished soldier in the State of Minnesota. He went into the Army early. His rank was humble. He was present at Gettysburg. He went in a subordinate company officer, and amid the storm of that battle, when his regiment was practically annihilated, he came out at the head of the regiment. He is a lawyer, a judge, an upright, honest man, a true soldier who has demonstrated his devotion to his country by his share in the terrible battle of Gettysburg.

Does any man mean to intimate that he does not love his comrades, that he is sacrificing their rights? Does any man pretend that he has not given evidence of his devotion to his country and his comrades, which is unquestionable? Shall Senators who never heard a musket fired, unless it was an accident, assail the character of this eminent, brave man, this lawyer and judge, and charge him with being false to his comrades?

Mr. President, I gave his name, I referred to his service, and I will place William Lochren alongside the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and let the country judge which is most liable to be false or to be true to the brave men who took part in the war of the rebellion.

It is quite a common thing to abuse Mr. Smith, Secretary of the Interior. He is a young man, and I have no objection to people pitching into him. He seems to have a broad back, and I shall not take the trouble to defend him. He is an active, intelligent man. But does my colleague or the Senator from New Hampshire know of a single case where a pension has been improperly rejected? I pause for a reply. I have devoted very much time to the investigation of this question. I have known instances where claims I thought were improperly scrutinized. I do not object to scrutiny. I have gone to the Pension Office with personal testimony and with evidence I have collected demonstrating the justice of claims which were questioned.

I do not challenge the right of the Government to question the claim of anyone who makes an application for a pension. It is the right and the duty of the Government to do so. But I again ask, can either of those Senators put his finger on a single instance where a pension claim has been improperly rejected? If they can, then it will be time enough to speak and time enough to denounce this soldier, this true man, and charge him with being influenced by base prejudices against his comrades in arms.

I myself know of some cases where, in my judgment, the demands for proof were unnecessarily severe, but they have been met. I know of no cases, and I should be obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire or to my colleague if either of them will give me the name of a single soldier whose claim has been improperly rejected under the administration of William Lochren. I should be obliged to them for it, and I will pledge myself that it shall be investigated so fully that there shall not be room for doubt in respect to the rights of the pensioner.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not care to go into a controversy of that kind, as I think it is unnecessary. But I can cite to the Senator from Illinois a great many cases where I think very great injustice has been done to the soldiers of my State. I think I can cite him to a case now. A man who for four years has not done one single hour's work, who was a soldier in the war for three years, who has the evidence of every prominent citizen in his own town, Democrat and Republican, and the affidavits of three physicians on file, has been asking for his pension. He is destitute, and is supported in part by the town. He has been applying for a long time. The other day he was told that his pension was held up in order that inquiry might be made of his neighbors concerning his condition. That is but one of a great many cases which might be cited.

I will say, with the consent of the Senator from Illinois, because I should be very loath to unnecessarily take his time, that I made no attack upon Commissioner Lochren. I said not one word in derogation of his work. On the contrary, I said that the work of the Bureau was being admirably administered. But I did say that in my judgment his superior officers were to blame in these matters, and I believe that from the very bottom of my heart.

Mr. PALMER. That is the most serious assault upon the Commissioner of Pensions that has yet been made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make it.

Mr. PALMER. It is an intimation that the Commissioner of Pensions would hold the pitiful office he has upon the condition of being unjust to his comrades. If that were true, and there were any improper influences brought to bear or attempted to be brought to bear upon the Commissioner of Pensions, the office would be thrown in the face of the superior who attempted it. Judge Lochren would not hold the office a moment if the condition was that he was to be unjust to his comrades. To imagine it is an insult.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the consent of the Senator from Illinois, I will state that this is the first time I have ever known that subordinate officers are not controlled by their superior officers in all these matters of administration. Nearly one year ago attention was called to the fact that thousands upon thousands of soldiers were suspended from the rolls without any charge being made against them, except such as came to the office by way of letter or something of that kind.

After ten or eleven months, after the soldiers had suffered torture such as only men who are in destitution can suffer, the Commissioner reversed that order for the better administration of his office, as it is stated. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois if he does not think that very great injustice has been done in the matter by suspending their pensions and dropping the pensioners from the rolls arbitrarily, as has been done?

Mr. PALMER. I have no doubt in the world that injustice has been done by suspending their pensions. It was a mistake on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions—and not so much, either, on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions. I insisted that that was not the way to reach them. I think it was an improper attempt to investigate or to suspend before investigation. But that is no longer true. The restorations were made.

At the time of the accession of Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency there was throughout the country clamor against the administration of the Pension Bureau. I have been acquainted with most of the Commissioners of Pension. A distinguished citizen of my own State came into that office upon the accession of Mr. Cleveland after his first election. I know something of a Commissioner of Pensions who came from Indiana. I know that in Gen. Harrison's Administration, when the affairs of the Pension Office were conducted by Gen. Raum, the latter was assailed. I am satisfied he is an honest, manly man. I am satisfied that he was imposed upon in some instances. The administration of the Pension Bureau has sometimes been too liberal; there has been a sort of desire or effort to induce men to apply for pensions, and this miserable political feeling and the desire to get their votes have put upon the pension rolls some improper persons.

But I take it upon myself to say that, taking it on the whole, making all proper allowances for lapses of memory and mistakes, no law has been more faithfully administered than the pension laws. The administration of the present Commissioner is as honest, as manly, as true, and as much in the interest of the soldiers as that of any Administration which preceded it.

Mr. President, the only material question to me is whether there is money enough appropriated by the pending bill to pay the pensions. I should not administer the law more liberally than it is administered, but if I had my way I should amend the law, and I should make the pension system more comprehensive.

But the officer who is charged with the administration of the law must execute the law as it is. I repeat, that if I could find an instance, or could be told of an instance, where the Pension Commissioner has disregarded the rights of any single soldier, and has rejected any case that ought to be allowed, I should point it out to him—I should denounce it. But here we are met with the idea that the Republican party will, when they return to power, which is anticipated, I believe, administer the law with more liberality and benevolence. I suppose they will administer the law as it is, and not otherwise. I suppose the present Commissioner is administering the law as it is, and not otherwise.

But my colleague arraigns the Democratic party for many other things. He will have an opportunity of doing that hereafter. It is not material to me to defend the Democratic party on those points. I do not choose to waste time in that sort of skirmishing. I leave that to my colleague. His speech will go into the newspapers and do him good, I trust. When we meet on the hustings in Illinois and my colleague there charges that the pension laws are not properly administered, I shall ask him to give the name of any person, of any old soldier, whose claim William Lochren has improperly rejected; and I shall be satisfied with nothing else.

I shall not permit my comrade, this gallant man who went in at Gettysburg at the storm of battle, to be arraigned upon a mere intimation. I shall not permit it to be said again that William Lochren would hold an office under the Secretary of the Interior upon the condition that he should be unjust to his comrades. If either Mr. Smith or Mr. Cleveland has entertained ill feelings towards the soldiers, I shall not allow it to be said without contradiction that Judge Lochren has consented to be the minister of their base hates or their contemptible prejudices. It can not be so.

The pension law has been fairly administered, Mr. President. These investigations, as I said before, were commenced at a time when it was believed that there were many frauds on the pension law. There have been some reductions. I do not think much of them. But the pension appropriations are becoming less for another reason. The roll is being called daily, nightly. Every hour, every minute almost, the name of some of these veterans is called by a voice that will allow of no other answer than "here." There is no escape; the name is stricken off the roll of the soldiers of the country and placed upon a roll imperishable.

Mr. President, I am not disposed to consume time in the discussion of this question. All I meant to say was that this is unkind, unfair. This pension appropriation bill is one that makes provision for the benefit of these old soldiers. It ought to have been passed, as I think, without criticism except to suggest that it is too small or too lage; but it is no occasion for the exhibition of mere partisan prejudice and for the indulgence of mere party vituperation.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I am a little surprised at my colleague. He comes into the Senate as though he had suddenly wakened up and attacks me as having made all sorts of charges against the Commissioner of Pensions. If he had heard what I said entire he would not have made the charge. All that I have said that in any special degree reflected upon the Commissioner was the criticism I made, which appears in this document, his own report.

I ask my colleague whether he indorses the action of the Commissioner in every instance in reducing pensioners from $6 to $4, from $12 to $8, and from $18 to $17, and from $17 to $16.25? If he indorses him in that, he and I differ. I do not, and I do not believe my colleague does any more than I do.

I want to say to my colleague in addition that he himself has criticised in my hearing the action of the Administration in reference to pensions more than I have, either publicly or privately, and when he undertakes to lecture me upon what I have been doing and saying I have a right to retort upon him in the same spirit.

I have shown (and I defy my colleague to contradict it) that the policy of the Democratic party from the beginning in reference to pensions has been by a majority of the party in Congress to vote in almost every instance against every important pension bill, and I show the record and give the facts. Does my colleague dispute that? And I want to say to him that if he does not believe the laws are sufficient he is chairman of the Committee on Pensions and why does he not report a bill from that committee? That is all I have to say on that point.

My colleague comes in here with one of his old stories about the pig, and he undertakes to show in this case which is the pig. Well, my opinion is that he has proved that the pig is the man whom he said was not the pig in his story.

Referring to Mr. Lochren, I have made no unkind criticism of him whatever; but I have said (and my colleague can charge that I am bringing politics into this controversy or not, as he pleases) that the policy of the party, the Administration, the President, and all concerned, has been to stop the payment of such large amounts of pensions.

As an indication of it, when the first estimate was made the Commissioner of Pensions stated that $160,000,000 was required, but when the time came for passing the bill he had reduced it to $150,000,000; and if the policy should go on which the Administration has inaugurated in reducing pensions, as is shown by this bill, he could have put it at $140,000,000 just as well, because there will be a surplus when this year ends, as there was $25,000,000 of surplus when the 30th of June came at the end of the last fiscal year.

It is very easy to say that we are for this bill. So am I for it. I said in the remarks I did make that I am for the bill; that I am for the appropriation of the estimate of the Commissioner. Does my colleague find any fault with that? I thought I was doing right in that. But the fault I find is that it is the policy of the party to reduce, reduce, reduce, as this document shows.

Mr. DOLPH. How many cases are recorded in that document?

Mr. CULLOM. There are 9,509 cases that were suspended in the first place. There was a wholesale suspension of pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. They were restored, were they not?

Mr. CULLOM. They were restored.

Mr. GALLINGER. At their former rate.

Mr. CULLOM. But they were suddenly suspended. My colleague can not deny that he found fault with the Commissioner on account of that conduct. He did not believe that it was proper for the Commissioner or anybody else to suspend without notice 5,000 of the men who were drawing pensions.

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose they must have been dependent upon their pensions for their daily sustenance.

Mr. CULLOM. They were largely dependent upon their pensions for their daily sustenance. My colleague knows as well as I do that each of us received hundreds of letters appealing to us to get them back upon the rolls because they had nothing else to live upon. I appeal to my colleague now to know whether he does not condemn or did not condemn that policy upon the part of the Commissioner?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me, I will state that the entire number of suspensions, according to the document he has in his hands, is something over 15,000. Nine thousand and some odd of the 15,000, after having been tortured and annoyed and compelled to furnish other evidence than satisfied a former Commissioner of Pensions, have been restored at the old rate, and the other 6,000 have been variously taken care of. Some were dropped and some are now suspended.

Mr. CULLOM. There are 15,520 altogether, I believe, and that is what I complain of. My colleague feels very indignant and intimates that he will not allow anything of this sort to go on in the Senate without his condemnation. I believe I am a free man in the Senate, and I think I will venture to speak what I believe upon the pension question or any other without asking my colleague or anybody else.

Now, Mr. President, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in further discussion. My purpose in the beginning, and that is all that I did, was to give a sort of historical account of the action of the two parties in the Congress of the United States from the time we began to pass pension laws, and I did it without any very severe criticism.

I simply gave the facts as they appear in the record; and then at the end I made a remark or two about this document. I say again, the policy of the Administration was not as I believe it ought to have been. My colleague may say if he chooses, "Oh, you were not in the war." Let me say I never undertook to palm myself off upon the country for anything I was not. I think I have the respect of the soldiers of my State about as much as my colleague or anybody else has, because they know I am a plain, blunt man, and say what I believe, and state what I think is the truth.

But I want to say as to the surplus of $25,000,000 that has been saved to the Government, if you please, by the Commissioner under the policy of the Administration, in my opinion a good deal of it at least ought to have gone to the people who have been pared off in the amount that they were to get, little by little, as the agents of the Department traveled around over the whole country examining into their cases.

If they had exercised the degree of liberality that in my judgment they ought to have exercised, there would not have been a surplus of twenty-five millions to turn into the Treasury. I believe in economy. I want to economize wherever we can consistently do so; but I do not believe in a system of economy which puts soldiers in the poorhouse and which results almost in starvation to those who do not go there, and who are dependent upon the mere pittance the Government gives them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we are somewhat accustomed, those of us who did not see service in the Army, to be lectured by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] who was one of the bravest and grandest soldiers of the Republic. I do not know how it may have been in Illinois. In New Hampshire it was very necessary for some loyal men to stay at home and take care of the disloyal Democrats, who were almost in a majority in our State in 1860. I did some service in that line. I did not fight as the Senator from Illinois fought, but it is just possible that in certain ways I contributed my mite to the extent of my ability as loyally and as honestly to the country as he did.

If the Senator from Illinois had not got off his high horse and admitted, with a great deal of frankness and refreshing earnestness that there had been great wrongs done to the soldiers by the suspension of pensions I would have furnished the Senate with a large mass of testimony on that point, which I will not burden the RECORD with. However I do want to call attention to two or three cases. There is a case in my own State, where a man is paralyzed completely, who suffered a terrible injury in the service, and who, if he is alive to-day, can not live much longer, and yet his pension of $72 a month was cut off. He was refused that pension for months and months. He was cared for by the county. He became a public charge. I, myself, took the trouble to go 18 miles to visit him. I made a professional examination, and furnished a certificate concerning his most deplorable condition.

I will say that the Commissioner of Pensions, upon the evidence furnished, restored that man to the roll at the old rate; but think of the torture the poor man endured, and all the wrong that was committed against him in being dropped from the roll without one tittle of evidence to show he was not entitled to the pension he was drawing. That is one case of a great many in my own State which have come under my personal observation. I stand here to say (and I am glad the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Pensions corroborates what I say) that great injustice and wrong have been done to the soldiers during the present Administration in the matter of suspending arbitrarily the pensions that were granted to them by former Administrations upon sworn evidence satisfactory to the predecessors of the Commissioner.

I have here a letter from a poor old soldier out in Kansas, in the Soldiers' Home there, where he has been for fourteen months, having formerly been in the home in Virginia. He was notified through a comrade that his name was posted in the Soldiers' Home in Virginia and his pension was suspended. He had been in Kansas over a year; his pension checks had been sent to him at that point; and yet it was posted in Virginia that his pension had been suspended. He says he wrote two or three letters to the Commissioner and got no reply; that he marked them "Personal," but could not get any answer. After a time, upon entreaty from parties in the public service here, he was notified to go to Richmond, Va., for examination. He was at the Soldiers' Home in Kansas. That case may have been an oversight, but it ought never to have occurred. That man's pension ought never to have been suspended. He was restored to the roll at the old rate, but he was tormented, kept out of his pension for months, worried almost to death, writing letters here to comparative strangers, and begging them to do something for him.

Here is a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions; a very manly letter it is. In my own city a poor man who had done remarkably faithful service in the Army had been to Boston and had undergone a fearful surgical operation, not entirely successful. It was discontinued because if it had been continued to the end he would have died under the knife. He came home to find two days afterwards that his pension was suspended. A letter from his wife was written to me. I communicated it to the Pension Office. That man for weeks and months lying on a death bed, dying a few weeks afterwards, was kept out of his pension, worrying and wondering how he would get bread to support his daily needs.

I say the Commissioner of Pensions frankly acknowledged that a mistake had been made It is to his credit that he made that acknowledgement. He says that certain papers in the case were kept from him, or at least that his attention had not been called to them, that the man ought to be restored, and he was restored to his former rate of pension. A few weeks after his restoration he was again carried to Boston and died under the knife in the city hospital of that city. That pension ought never to have been taken from that man. It was a wicked and cruel thing, just as thousands of other suspended pensions have been wicked and cruel in the extreme. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] is very anxious to have names. I do not care to give the name in that case. He can see the letter if he chooses to look at it, but I have no disposition to stir up strife unnecessarily.

I repeat to the Senator from Illinois that I made no unjust animadversions upon the Commissioner of Pensions. I think his suggestion that he is not influenced by his superior officers is one about which we can at least honestly differ.

Here is a letter signed Hale Gage from Townsend, Mass. Mr. Gage lives in that town. It shows that an increase of pension was awarded to Edmund O. Day, of Watertown, Mass., in October, 1893, and that Mr. Day died June 2, 1893.

I have in my committee room a letter from the Pension Bureau calling for further evidence in a pension case, saying that the case "is not fully proved," when the man had died ten days before the letter came from the Pension Bureau, and he died of diseases contracted in the Army, according to the evidence of his neighbors and the surgeons who attended him at the time of his return and afterwards.

Here is a case stated by John Jenkins, of 2307 Pacific street, Brooklyn, in which he says:

SIR: My brother was pensioned at $6 a month. He was unable to answer a notice from the Pension Bureau to "show cause," being too ill from the cause for which that pittance was allowed. The pension was suspended. At Chicago I received notice from the Bureau that my brother was not sufficiently disabled to entitle him to draw that amount. At that time my brother was dying of the complaint for which the pension was granted.

JOHN JENKINS.

2307 PACIFIC STREET, Brooklyn.

Here is another case:

CANANDAIGUA, N. Y., August 18.

John Shirley, a veteran of the war, who lives in Bristol, Ontario County, has had his pension cut off. He is totally disabled, and the small amount which the Government has been paying him has barely supported him. He had no other income. To prevent him from starving to death Shirley has been taken to the asylum at Ovid.

And here is another:

SIR: I have drawn $8 a month pension for three years, being totally disabled. I served three years in the Tenth Wisconsin Regiment, and never applied for a pension until crippled by age. I am 65. Two months ago Hoke Smith cut off my pension without cause and without explanation. I never knew it until the check failed to come. Then I wrote to the Secretary. After three weeks a reply came that my pension had been suspended. No cause was given. Is this fair? Is it lawful?

E. S. TALCOTT.

MERIDEN, Conn.

I presume it is the work of some clerk in the Bureau—I do not hold Commissioner Lochren responsible for these little matters—but here is a case where a claimant was asked to file a sworn statement, "showing when, where, and how he contracted senile debility." The Pension Bureau wanted him to file a sworn statement showing when, where, and how he contracted old age. His answer is a very good one, and I am going to read it. He says:

My age is 70; I can not say precisely when and where I contracted senile debility. It has come on quite gradually. I seemed free from it entirely at my birth; yet if I had not been born as far back as I was, I am sure I would not be suffering with it so seriously as now. The most eminent authorities are agreed that old age is of a permanent character, and I begin to feel certain that my chances of becoming younger are exceedingly slim.

They asked him to show that old age was not due to vicious habits.

In my case senile debility is not due to vicious habits; yet I have a habit of getting older each day. I have been infirm for the last ten years.

I presume that everything is being done in the Pension Office that can be done, and yet here is an answer from the Pension Bureau concerning a case that has been pending for years, a case concerning which I know quite considerable myself, and this poor soldier is told that "owing to the continuous accumulation of work in the special examination division, in which over 20,000 claims of various classes are now pending investigation, it is clearly impossible to approximate the date of final action on your claim."

I said nearly a year ago, in discussing the bill I then introduced, that it seemed to be the policy of the Pension Department instead of settling unsettled claims to unsettle settled claims. That has been the difficulty all through this administration of the Pension Bureau, and that is the reason why soldiers have a right to find fault with the administration of the bureau so far as they are concerned.

I have just one more word to say, and it is for the benefit of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. I wish to read an extract from a Democratic paper in his State, the Marion Press. I presume Marion is a town in Illinois, and there is no doubt it is a Democratic newspaper. The Marion Press says:

The Press desires to be fair, honest, and square in its dealings with all classes of people. It not only desires to be fair, but it is going to be, if it "takes the skin off" of somebody's carcass. So it publishes the following article in regard to the suspension of a deserving ex-soldier's pension. The article is a contribution from a private citizen to a Cairo paper. President Cleveland—had better have a settlement with Hoke Smith and his Pension Commissioner, Col. Lochren, and appoint their successors. If things are to be carried on in this way until 1896 there will not be enough Democrats—Administration Democrats—

This Democratic paper says—

"Administration Democrats," this paper says. It qualifies the word "Democrats." That is the wing of the party, I think, to which my distinguished friend from Illinois belongs—

There will not be enough Democrats—Administration Democrats—left in Illinois to form a decent funeral procession. It is simply outrageous and a shame that worthy pensioners should be treated in this manner. But here is the article:

"Anciently, we are told, when a sacrifice is to be made, the flock from which the victim was to be selected was driven through a chute just large enough to admit one at a time. A man stood by and as one after another passed through the victim for the sacrifice was touched with a wand besmeared with paint, and thus 'spotted.' This was called 'passing under the rod.' So Pension Commissioner Lochren has corraled all the pensions under the law of June 27, 1890. And as the poor, trembling unfortunates are squirming through the Bureau chute the Commissioner stands by with wand in hand, and in ghoulish glee touches a victim now and then to serve as a sacrifice to the malice and spite entertained toward the ex-soldier for giving the 'patriots' such a sound thrashing some thirty years ago.

"The one spotted in Union County, Ill., was a corporal in Company I, Eighty-first Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and for bravery and other good qualities was detailed as a color guard (cowards, coffee coolers, thieves, and perjurers didn't get such places), the holder of certificate No. 515833, granted under the law of June 27, 1890, which allows $12 per month. On the 22d instant the rod touched him. His pension is suspended and he is modestly required to report before the board at Omaha, Nebr., only about 500 miles from his home. Of course there is nothing unreasonable about that, when we take into account that he has been under medical treatment constantly for four years, and has been able during that time to earn $16.10, about half the amount of the expenses of the trip prescribed by his honor, Mr. Lochren, and the further fact that he owns no property and has not a cent of income except what his little wife can earn by working extra hours.

Now, Mr. Lochren had as well have ordered him to go to the moon or to Jupiter. He could have gotten there as easily as to Omaha, Nebr. The animus of it all is to suspend someone's pension and then require of them impossibilities, and when they fail to comply, revoke their certificate and make their claim fraud. The long and short of it is, the cry has gone forth that there are one hundred thousand fraudulent pensions issued, and they must be found; fairly if they can, foully if they must. Mr. Lochren says that justice shall be done to all. But it seems to me that his declaration on the one hand and action on the other are as difficult to harmonize as to understand the philosophy of the Trinity or the immutability of the Godhead. We are forced to the painful conclusion that Col. Lochren is the monkey used by this Administration to claw hot chestnuts from burning embers.

Mr. President, I do not vouch for the authenticity of the statement made in that letter, but from what I know in multitudes of other cases, I have no doubt it is absolutely correct in every particular. When the Senator from Illinois goes home I hope he will take the editor of this Democratic newspaper into his keeping and administer as sound a drubbing to him as he did to his colleague and myself because we ventured to say that injustice in many respects had been done to the old soldiers of the Republic under the present reform Administration.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I shall not trouble the editor of the newspaper by any notice whatever, but I am very much surprised that my friend from New Hampshire should bring that miserable story here and give it his indorsement. I can give the facts very briefly. Before I come to that, however, my colleague intimates that he is a free man. He is, beyond all doubt. All I have said to my colleague is that if he repeats these charges against Judge Lochren in Illinois I shall ask him for specifications, and I shall contradict them unless they are supported. It is his right to make the charges and my right to contradict them; and I presume we shall both exercise that right with perfect freedom.

I find by a memorandum I have in my hand, in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, that there were in June, 1893, 966,012 pensioners. By the way, I take occasion to state to my colleague that I have criticised with the most perfect freedom the order suspending pensions. Perhaps it is not quite so delicate as it might be for my colleague to repeat our private conversation here, but I very distinctly avowed that I thought it was wrong, and I think so yet. I did not attribute it, however, to any hostility to soldiers. I suppose it was an attempt to ascertain the extent to which frauds had been practiced under the pension laws. But there were 9,509 pensioners suspended and restored at the same rates. There are now, or were at the date of this report, 273 suspended cases that had not been disposed of. There had been 3,014 pensions reduced, and there had been 2,411 dropped.

That is the history of this thing. Out of 966,000 this is the result of the investigation. It strikes me that that is not so remarkable. I am not familiar with the prior history of the operation of the pension laws, but those are the facts.

The Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Illinois in their assertions that the Pension Bureau has been unfriendly to soldiers, simply do them an injustice. I may say that I find men in all parties who grudge the amount of money that goes to pay pensions. A good many economical men think it is too much money to impose upon the people. A good many men, I think, feel that the pension system has been abused. I do not agree with them; but I will say (and with that I will conclude) that any attempt on the part of Republican politicians or Democratic politicians to make political capital out of our pension system is simply disgraceful. It is unstatesmanlike, and I have a good many other words on my tongue's end to characterize a thing which will at present remain unuttered. It is most disgraceful that the claims of these men and their services shall be made the shuttlecock to be bandied back and forward by politicians, by men who care nothing about them, but still are eager to get their votes and to persuade them that in some essential respect they love them better than anybody else.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the first amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire desires to have the first amendment reserved.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to reserve that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reserved. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an amendment to the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment will be stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole read, and then the amendment which I propose, so that the matter may be understood by the Senator who has charge of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will first be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 6, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole inserted the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That so much of the act approved December 21, 1893, as provides that "any pension heretofore or that may hereafter be granted to any applicant shall be deemed and held by all officers of the United States to be a vested right in the grantee to that extent that payment thereof shall not be withheld or suspended until, after due notice to the grantee of not less than thirty days, the Commissioner of Pensions, after hearing all the evidence, shall decide to annul, vacate, modify, or set aside the decision upon which such pension was granted," shall not be held or construed to apply to any case where the pensioner is drawing more than one pension, or the title to the pension has ceased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment will now be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment the following:

And provided further, That this act shall not be so construed as to require the Commissioner of Pensions to annul, vacate, modify, or set aside upon a difference of opinion between said Commissioner and that of any previous Commissioner, any decision as to a rate of pension allowed upon the facts and evidence which constituted the basis of the original action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BRICE. The amount of appropriations made by this bill is $151,581,570; the amount of estimates made by the Department, $162,631,570; and the amount of appropriations made for the preceding fiscal year, ending June 30, 1894, $166,531,350.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

H. W. SHIPLEY.

Mr. BRICE obtained the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for the consideration of a private bill, which will take but a minute. I am sure there will be no discussion upon it.

Mr. BRICE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon, with the understanding that the bill will not lead to debate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 120) for the relief of H. W. Shipley.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to H. W. Shipley $2,487.38, in full compensation for work done and material furnished by him in excess of that required of him by his agreement with the Indian Bureau in the construction of a gristmill and sawmill at the Nez Perce Indian Agency, in the Territory of Idaho.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRICE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5894, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5894) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BRICE. I ask that the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such will be the order, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Mr. BRICE. The committee recede from that amendment, and will allow the bill to remain as it originally stood when received from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. BRICE. In that connection I wish to say that the amendment reported by the committee was drawn so as to conform to the estimate. After the bill had passed the House of Representatives and after the Senate amendment had been proposed, the Secretary of War addressed a communication to the Senate, which has been printed, and which I shall read. It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., May 16, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, copy of a communication from the Superintendent of the Military Academy, dated the 15th instant, inviting attention to the amendment as reported to the Senate, of the item for continuing the construction of one new reservoir, page 17, lines 18 to 24, of the Military Academy appropriation bill (H. R. 5894).

I concur in the recommendation of Col. Ernst that the item be restored to the shape in which it passed the House.

Very respectfully,

DANIEL S. LAMONT,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY,
West Point, N. Y., May 15, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to invite attention to page 17, lines 18 to 24, of the Military Academy appropriation bill as it has just been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Appropriations.

As it passed the House the bill provided "for continuing the construction of one new reservoir, $25,000." It has been amended so as to provide "for cleaning and improving watersheds of reservoirs, removing the shallow flowage of reservoirs, raising, extending, repairing, and strengthening reservoir dams, and laying a new connection to the southern part of the reservation, $25,000," omitting any provision for the new reservoir.

At the time of submitting the regular annual estimates last summer the subject of the water supply and the site of the new reservoir provided in the current appropriation bill was undergoing careful study. The estimates contained an item for cleaning watersheds, etc., as provided in this amendment, but nothing additional for the new reservoir.

The result of the investigation then going on was to show that the cost of the new reservoir would largely exceed the amount then available, and that the amount which Congress would probably allow for water supply this year, understood to be $25,000, could more advantageously be applied to continuing the new reservoir than to cleaning watersheds, etc.

The matter was explained in my letters to the Adjutant-General, dated December 7, 1893, and to a member of the House Committee on Military Affairs, dated December 27, 1893, forwarded to him through the War Department. It was in accordance with these later recommendations that the bill was drawn as it passed the House.

I beg leave to suggest that the matter be brought to the attention of the Senate Committee, and that they be requested to restore the item if possible to the shape in which it passed the House.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. ERNST,
Colonel of Engineers, Superintendent.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.

I now propose to allow the bill to stand in this respect as it was passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BATE. I think that ought to be done. I have been recently at West Point in an official capacity, and I know something about it. I think the committee amendment had better be receded from.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the committee amendment has been withdrawn. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 18, line 6, before the words "new reservoir," to strike out "said."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 19, after the word "available," to insert:

And the appropriation of $2,000 made by the act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, for asphalt road and walk in front of and around the new gymnasium, is hereby made available for the construction of said road and walk of asphalt or other suitable material.

So as to make the clause read:

For furnishing and erecting in the natatorium of the gymnasium, in complete working order, six slate-lined compartments with six combination shower, spray, and needle baths, one gas heater, and one hot-water storage tank, $850, to be immediately available; and the appropriation of $2,000 made by the act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, for asphalt road and walk in front of and around the new gymnasium, is hereby made available for the construction of said road and walk of asphalt or other suitable material.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one thousand" and insert "two thousand four hundred and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

For new mangers and general repairs to interior of cavalry stables, $2,460, to be immediately available.

For new sewer from Rugertown to connect with new sewer from new soldiers' hospital to river, $2,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 14, on page 23.

Mr. BRICE. I move to strike out the words "to be immediately available," after the word "dollars," in line 13, on page 23.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 24, line 2, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BRICE. I think it is proper to state at this time that the total appropriations provided for in the bill are $401,283.08; the total estimates made to Congress were $463,183.58; and the total appropriations for the last fiscal year were $432,556.12.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The CLERK. The Clerk is in receipt of the following communication from the Speaker:

The resolution was agreed to.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Tennessee, if he is present, will please come forward and take the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

NOTIFYING PRESIDENT AND SENATE OF ELECTION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to notify the President of the United States and the Senate that the House has elected Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, a Representative from the State of Tennessee, as Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. HOOKER, on account of sickness. I have just been advised that he is confined to his bed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6447) fixing the term of the Federal district and circuit court for the southern judicial district of Mississippi to be held in Meridian, Miss., to include the counties named, with Senate amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will first report the amendments.

The amendments were reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Mississippi. If there be no objection, the Chair will submit the question on the amendments in gross.

Mr RAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman, for information. Is that a bill that came from the Committee on the Judiciary to the House?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It came to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, it passed the House, went to the Senate. The Senate has made certain amendments, by striking out certain counties which were put in this district.

Mr. RAY. I would like to know, before giving consent so far as I am concerned, whether you have conferred with all the Representatives from your State and it is satisfactory to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir; I have conferred with them all, and in the House we struck out some counties at the request of some of them, and the balance of the bill was agreed to; and then the Senate has made certain other alterations.

Mr. RAY. These amendments make no change except in the boundaries and limit?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There are two amendments which the Senate adopted. One of them strikes out a couple of counties which were in my bill; another amendment strikes out a section of the bill.

Mr. RAY. What is that section?

Mr. BAILEY. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that it is not a matter of unanimous consent, but a motion to concur in the Senate amendments to a House bill, which is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I made the motion to concur.

Mr. RAY. I suppose it was in order; but I wanted to know something about it.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. RAY. I did not want to make any controversy or any speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Section 10, which was stricken out by the Senate, is as follows:

That the United States shall not be at any expense in providing for a building or room for holding the terms of said court at Meridian.

Senator GEORGE, the senior Senator from Mississippi, told me the reason for doing that was the Federal Government has already appropriated for a building at Meridian, and as they had some idea that this might possibly conflict with the appropriation already made for that building (in which I did not agree with him), the section was stricken out. I make the motion to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to voting on the amendments in gross? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

MINING CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6558) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. WEADOCK. I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. TRACEY. We would like to know the nature of the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, in lines 21 and 22 strike out the words "and the Second Congressional district of the State of Colorado."

Mr. TRACEY. I will ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEADOCK] whether he objects to the Senate amendment?

Mr. WEADOCK. We do.

The motion of Mr. WEADOCK was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WEADOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. WEADOCK, Mr. TATE, and Mr. SHAW as conferees on the part of the House.

ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS AND MANITOBA RAILWAY.

Mr. HALL of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 1694) granting to the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company the right of way through the White Earth, Leech Lake, Chippewa, and Fond du Lac Indian Reservations in the State of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HALL of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MATHIAS PEDERSEN.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5009) for the relief of Mathias Pedersen.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have the report read.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I object.

REGISTER FOR SCHOONER BARGE ASTORIA.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7197) to provide a register for the schooner barge Astoria.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built ship Astoria, purchased and owned by George Grall and repaired in American ports and converted into a schooner barge, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read, the right to object being reserved.

The report (by Mr. PIGOTT) was read, as follows:

The barge Astoria was built at Bath, in the State of Maine, sold to an English firm and registered under the British flag. In August, 1893, she was abandoned by her crew off the coast of the United States and picked up by some tugs from Charleston, S. C., and towed into Port Royal. The ship grounded on the bar there and became a wreck. She became a wreck only when she reached Port Royal. She was sold by the United States marshal; was purchased by an American citizen, and in March, 1894, was repaired in America and converted into a coal barge. The repairs cost $11,000. She had been purchased by the party who repaired her for only $1,300.

Considering all the facts, your committee report the bill admitting the vessel to American registry favorably, with the recommendation that it pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. REED. Before consent is given, I wish to ask why this case does not come under the general law for the transfer of registry?

Mr. CLANCY. The Treasury Department has examined into this matter, and it has been found that a special act is necessary, because this vessel was a derelict previous to being wrecked. She was found at sea, outside the limit of American waters, was towed in, and afterward became a wreck.

Mr. COOMBS. The vessel was a derelict outside, as I understand.

Mr. CLANCY. I will repeat: She was picked up as a derelict, brought in, and then became a wreck.

Mr. REED. What would be the full value of the vessel when in proper condition?

Mr. CLANCY. The wreck sold for $1,300, and was repaired at an expense of $11,000.

Mr. REED. What does such a barge cost if built anew?

Mr. CLANCY. I have no knowledge of that matter. This vessel is now used as a coal barge for towing from Norfolk, Va., to New York.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. She certainly has been repaired beyond the requirement of the law.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLANCY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 7506) authorizing the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds for the construction of a county building at the county seat thereof; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PHILIP MILBAUHR.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4802) for the relief of Philip Milbauhr.

The bill was read.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read, subject to objection.

Mr. BYNUM. I object to the consideration of the bill.

BILOXI AND BACK BAY BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 5478) to authorize the Biloxi and Back Bay Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge over that portion of the bay of Biloxi, in the State of Mississippi, known as Back Bay.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

An amendment reported by the committee, to insert the word "can" before the word "navigate" in line 4 of section 3, was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STOCKDALE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6284) to prevent interference in the collection of State, county, and municipal taxes assessed against corporations and corporate property, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

Mr. DOCKERY and Mr. OUTHWAITE demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. BARTLETT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back, with amendments, the bill (S. 1930) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Lexington, Mo.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ing amendments and the bill to its passage, when the vote shall be taken without delay or other motion.

That Thursday, the 12th instant, after the second morning hour, be assigned to the consideration of business reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

This order not to interfere with the consideration of conference reports or revenue or appropriation bills.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken: and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILSON of Washington) there were—ayes 84, noes 3.

Mr. BABCOCK. No quorum.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed Mr. OUTHWAITE and Mr. BABCOCK as tellers at the desk.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 52, answered "present" 8, not voting 138, as follows:

During the call of the roll the following message from the Senate was received:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895; and

A bill (H. R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to make the suggestion, but some message has been delivered that appears to have attracted considerable attention on the other side, and yet the members sitting here around me have no more idea what it is than what is to occur within the next twenty-four hours.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is the return of a great Democratic measure from the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And like all other Democratic measures, it is kept in the dark.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask that the message be read from the desk.

The titles of the bills were reported from the desk.

The roll call was then resumed and concluded, as above reported.

SPECIAL ORDER FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF BILLS.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there never was a proposition more unjustifiable than that which is now before the House. Here is a proposition which affects in one way and another 50,000,000 acres of land, and, by the assistance of coloring put upon a map it is apparently made to affect a very large portion of the United States. But its actual effect is large enough, without that somewhat unnecessary exaggeration.

It is not merely a question of forfeiting lands, for that perhaps might safely enough be left to the courts, which have already passed upon the question adversely to the position taken by the Committee on Public Lands; but it is absolutely a proposition to disturb the land titles of many millions of acres actually in the possession of the settlers themselves. And yet it is proposed to cut off the whole matter with two days' discussion, and by the hand of violence.

Of course, we on this side can do nothing to prevent such action being taken except to record our protest—to say that it is in violation of every reasonable system of debate, especially when you consider that this House is under no particular stress; that there is no reason in the world why we might not debate this question fully, thoroughly, and satisfactorily. The only compensation that I know of is that the public, so far as they allow themselves to be interested in this question at all, will look on and see the method adopted for carrying this bill through.

I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives, in conjunction with the Senate, has been in session now nearly one year. We are rapidly approaching the end of a complete year of practical session of the two Houses. And now, at this late period of time, we are called upon to vote upon a measure involving, as it necessarily will in my judgment, from fifty to one hundred and fifty lawsuits to every mile of the land-grant railways affected by the bill, and to do it upon a condition of debate such as we have at this point of our examination of the question.

I can only account for the hurry and rapidity with which this work is to be done by the existence of a consciousness on the other side of the House that we are about to close this session. And if that be true, I shall hail the fact with unqualified delight. I can myself see no particular reason why Congress should remain in session more than a very few days longer. The appropriation bills are coming very rapidly from the Senate, and I fancy there will be but slight contention between the two Houses about them.

And, Mr. Speaker, I understand and believe that the time is close at hand when the House of Representatives, purporting to represent, and being understood by the Constitution to represent, the people of the country, will have made arrangements, or if the arrangements are not quite completed now they soon will be, by which the House will retire from the position which it unfortunately took on the 1st day of last February, and the retreat will be in obedience to the demand of a superior power in this Government—a power greater than the House—and which will be all powerful and dominant upon the question of tariff reform.

The fiat has gone forth, and from the great principles of the Democratic party which have been urged, a retrogression has been ordered. We are ready now, as I understand it, to retire from the doctrine of free raw material. There is no free raw material left in the bill as it will be passed, and as you, in my judgment, are compelled to accept it or else go without tariff legislation, except free wool and free lumber, and there is no chance for any improvement upon these items of the bill. You have retired from the Democratic doctrine of ad valorem duties.

Upon all the questionable and doubtful items of the bill you have adopted specific duties, and the fiat has gone forth that you must accept them; and while you may make some wry faces, as everybody does who takes disagreeable medicine, you are, I think, fully prepared by the exhibitions of the last two or three weeks to be ready to take your medicine with a degree of complacency that will astonish the world.

Upon the great question of tariff for revenue you have abandoned that, and you have adopted a tariff for protection and trusts. It does not make any difference that my friends on the other side are opposed to these enormous concessions to the trusts of the country. You are opposed to them. I give you credit for that, but you can not help yourselves, and it is unnecessary to take a great deal of time to make your bluff.

I do not want to use language that most of the gentlemen on the other side will not understand. [Laughter.] But the bluff having been made, when the bluff is called, as it shortly will be, it is not necessary for you to stand long in exhibiting your impotency to win anything in a game like that. Therefore, in my judgment—and I offer this as a piece of advice to my friends on the other side—you have the alternative now to injure yourselves by kicking at your environments, by struggling in the mire in which you have found yourselves, or of gracefully yielding to the power that will ultimately dominate, and then you will have the pleasure of saying that you "always come downstairs that way."

So, Mr. Speaker, there is no hurry unless it is to adjust ourselves, so that after a little, after a few more efforts, after a little more demonstration of independence, after a few more struggles to pave the way to an explanation in some of the doubtful districts of the country, we can come down. There is no occasion for delay; one time is as good as another. Standing upon the order of your going is not important; you must go.

The inevitable is before us. You must have tariff legislation. You can not have it on Democratic lines. You can not have it on the lines of the Chicago platform. I regret it, inasmuch as it seems to be and will be a disappointment to many of my personal friends; but it is one of the misfortunes that you labor under, that you must abandon your ideas and flee to the mountains. You are compelled to have tariff legislation. You can not go home without it. You would stay here until the Constitution put an end to your power if you did not get tariff legislation; and when you reflect, you can get it only one way, and that is by a clear withdrawal of your attitude upon this question, why not do it at once and appeal to the Democratic party of the country and say to them, "We have learned something since the election by which you sent us to Congress."

Mr. REED. You do not mean to say that the Democratic party has learned anything? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not occupy a moment of time better than to congratulate my Republican friends upon the fact that the Democratic party has learned a great deal from us. I differ from the distinguished gentleman from Maine on that subject. I listened the other day, in the course of a debate in the Senate, to the debate upon the items of barbed wire and mica and a number of other articles, and I learned from the speeches of distinguished Democratic Senators that they had learned by heart all the Republican arguments in favor of a protective tariff. They told us how the article would be cheapened by a protective duty. They told us that a protective duty upon barbed wire had and always would have the effect of cheapening it to the farmer. They spoke about the effect that would follow in taking the duty off, of it being essential to the laboring man's occupation to continue a protective duty on the productions of this country and to raise the price of labor; and ultimately this gentleman, so indoctrinated with Republican opinions on this question, finally declared that the only way to make cheap the great production of North Carolina, the production of mica, was to keep the duty on that article, and finally a protective duty on that article would make it cheaper to the consumer of this country.

Mr. REED. Did a Democrat actually say that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; a very distinguished Democratic Senator.

Mr. REED. Then I withdraw pro tanto my observation, because what you have said sounds very natural.

Mr. GROSVENOR. These people on the Democratic side have copied very closely Republican speeches about a protective duty upon barbed wire and a protective duty upon the product of North Carolina, and many other special products. So I say that my friends on this side can take courage and thank Providence that they have been the schoolmasters to whom Democratic Senators and Representatives have gone to school; and to the Democrats I say, when you have passed this protective bill, which you must pass, when you put a duty on coal and iron ore, which we have been telling you is necessary for a great many years, you can get our speeches and reform your speeches to conform to ours for use in your Congressional districts, and escape from the wrath to come. [Laughter and loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does anyone else on that side desire to amuse himself?

Mr. REED. After you have got through some of us may want to amuse ourselves with you.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Let us have a vote.

The resolution was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED LAND GRANTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 121) to amend an act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, approved September 29, 1890.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up the Post-Office appropriation bill, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That could only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The order excepts appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman's motion can only be adopted by unanimous consent. The Chair will submit the request. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendments to the Post-Office appropriation bill. The Clerk will read the amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Pending the reading,

Mr. REED. How much is there of that? This time ought not to be consumed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is only one more amendment, the Chair is informed.

The reading of the Senate amendments was resumed and concluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think, Mr. Speaker, that that matter had better go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman objects. The bill will remain on the Speaker's table.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED LAND GRANTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The title was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule just adopted there remains one hour for general debate on the pending bill. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], who is in charge of the bill, to control one-half of that time, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] to control the remainder. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and that order will be made.

Mr. MCRAE. I ask unanimous consent that the order just adopted be so modified as to allow two hours for general debate, the remainder of the time to be used under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule just adopted allows one hour for general debate, after which the bill is to be considered in the House under the five-minute rule as in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] asks unanimous consent that there be two hours for general debate, instead of one hour. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and that order will be made. The Chair presumes the time allowed for general debate will be controlled equally by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. In the absence of objection that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MCRAE. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] will use some of his time now.

Mr. LACEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in 1890 a bill was brought into this House by the then chairman of the Public Lands Committee, which forfeited all lands which were unearned at that time, aggregating, as I now remember, about 50,000,000 acres. The veteran member from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was a member of the House at that time; and I remember very distinctly that, in the debate which was had when that bill was under consideration, that gentleman took occasion to say in substance that the bill then pending would probably settle all legislation on this much-vexed subject; a subject that had attracted the attention of Congress and of the public for twenty-nine years. And I think it was the consensus of opinion among members of the House at that time that the passage of that bill and its enactment into law would settle this question, and settle it forever.

But it seems that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], who happens to be chairman of this committee, desires to distinguish himself by having the present bill pass this House—a bill which confiscates many million acres of land belonging to private individuals at the present time. There is no justice and no equity in this proposition. The more the bill is examined, the more carefully the facts are gone over, the more clearly it must appear to every member of this House that this bill is in the nature of a confiscation act rather than a settlement of the rights of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], in his argument yesterday, admitted, if I understood him correctly, that all of the grants which have been made by the Government of the United States from time to time to railroads, were grants in presenti with a condition-subsequent, so that the railroads acquired technically a good title, and that where the road has been constructed since the expiration of the time prescribed in the grant itself, still the railroad company has a good title to the lands, and purchasers from the railroad company under those conditions acquire an absolute title.

In making this concession the gentleman is simply in line with every Attorney-General of the United States since the time of Gen. Devens, and is in harmony with the views of every administration of the Interior Department since the days when Hon. Carl Schurz presided over that great Department. In the limited time which I have for discussion, I shall not read the opinions of Attorney-General Devens or of Mr. Schurz when he was Secretary of the Interior; but both of those distinguished gentlemen, in opinions which are found in the volume I have before me, assert that these grants are grants which are known technically as grants in presenti with conditions subsequent, and that the railroad companies took good titles, and that wherever the conditions were completed, whether in time or out of time, and accepted by the Government of the United States, it is not in the power of the Government, after that time, to wrest the title of that property from the railroad companies or from those who have purchased from the railroad companies.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOATNER. While the official opinions to which the gentleman has referred have been given as he states, yet the question between the United States and these railroad companies has never been judicially decided. If the titles are perfect in the railroad companies and their vendees, what objection can there be to passing an act which will bring about a judicial decision of this question to settle it forever?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, my first answer to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] is that I deny his proposition. I contend that this identical question has been presented to the courts and decided in accordance with the opinions previously given by the Attorneys-General of the United States. In the case of Denny vs. Dobson, decided in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon, November 27, 1887, Mr. Justice Field adjudicated this identical question. He was sitting with the district judge out there; and this question was elaborately argued.

While I have not time to read the opinion of that learned jurist, I state without fear of successful contradiction that the identical question presented by the gentleman from Louisiana was passed upon by Judge Field; and he held that the Government of the United States is powerless to reverse these grants and take back this property from the railroad companies or from the parties to whom those companies have granted the land by proper conveyances. And that is perfectly clear in itself. A careful analysis of the statutes leads one to the conclusions reached by Judge Field in the case just referred to.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman misunderstood me. What I said was, that this question has not been decided in a suit in which the Government was a party. The courts have frequently maintained the doctrine that the performance of the condition out of the time bound the grantor, if permitted to be done. The courts have never decided the question, however, as to whether the Government of the United States, in the exercise of its sovereign power, can not assert its right of forfeiture.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, I disagree with the gentleman from Louisiana in that regard. I claim that the circuit court of Oregon, Justice Field presiding, did pass on that identical question, and decided that the railroad company acquired an indefeasible title. Now, the gentleman from Louisiana is a lawyer, and he knows what the word "indefeasible" means in that connection. It is a title which can not be abrogated or taken away from the company by the Government of the United States by any such process as is contemplated in this bill. And why should we now attempt to unsettle the tifles of thousands of the occupants of these lands by the passage of such a bill as this?

Why put the settlers, who purchased from the railroad companies, into litigation and unsettle their interests, simply because the gentleman from Louisiana says the Supreme Court of the United States has not formally passed upon the question? Even without the expression of opinion of the various Attorneys-General of the United States that have ruled upon it, and the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, as well as the opinion of Mr. Justice Field, I would still contend, sir, that it would be grossly unjust for the Government of the United States at this late day to pass this bill.

How many miles of road are involved in this legislation? As I remember, the exact number has not been stated heretofore. I have the figures before me, and these show the fact that it affects 3,550 miles of railroad. It affects nearly twenty-five different land grants. The majority of these, with a very few exceptions, have been completed and the title has been granted by the Government of the United States.

There is another principle that I desire to call to the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana in this matter, and that is this, that where these grants were in præsenti, with a condition-subsequent, and the Government of the United States, after the expiration of the time limited in the grants has treated with the railroad companies as though the conditions had been complied with, the Government is now estopped from asserting any of these rights that it is claimed were reserved. There is a law that all land-grant railroads shall carry the mails of the United States for 70 per cent of what is given to other companies.

There is another condition: that they shall transport the Army and munitions of war of the United States for 50 per cent of what is paid to other companies. With the full knowledge that these conditions were being complied with by the companies since the expiration of the time fixed in the original grants, the Government of the United States having gone on and required the railroads to carry the mails and the Army and the munitions of war at the rates specified in the law, I claim it was and is thereby estopped from asserting any right to now forfeit the lands conveyed in those grants.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time allowed to the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will yield to me five minutes longer.

Mr. LACEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have not the time to elaborate the point I have just suggested; but there is another question raised by the gentleman from Louisiana that I desire to note. He made the statement, as I understood him on yesterday, that there is a distinction between the grant to States as trustees to convey title to the land granted for railroad purposes and those cases where the grant has been made directly to the corporations themselves.

He admitted in his argument that where the grant was direct to the company the title was good; but he contended that where it was to the States no title passed, and undertook to compare that condition, in response to an inquiry of mine, to the case of a grant by an individual of the power of attorney to another individual to do a certain thing. I stated that there was a wide distinction between his illustration and the law, but I had no opportunity to point out to him in what respect, nor have I the time now to indulge in any illustration. But I call his attention to the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, reported in 21 Wallace, where the identical question in controversy between us was passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The State of Wisconsin held certain lands under a grant of such a character as the gentleman described, and through its agent undertook to recover of Harriman for the value of logs which had been cut and taken by him on land covered by one of these grants.

Mr. BOATNER. That is, the railroad company undertook to recover?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. He put in as a defense, that inasmuch as the railroad had not been completed within the ten years and that the State had not exercised its power of trustee to convey the title to the company, it was powerless in the premises, and that the wrong plaintiff had been brought into the suit; that the United States was the proper plaintiff, and that therefore the case could not be maintained against him.

The Supreme Court of the United States held that the grant was a grant in præsenti, with a condition-subsequent, precisely as a grant to the railroad in the first instance, and that recovery could be had for the trespass complained of, holding clearly the principle that the State after the expiration of the ten years, in the absence of any action on the part of the General Government, had the right to treat with the companies the same as it did within the limits of the ten years, and that any person acquiring title under such condition would have as indefeasible a title as if it had been conveyed within the time fixed in the original grant.

That is not set forth in the report in the exact terms I have here used, but I cite the principle laid down by the court in that case; and I go further, and say that every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States from that time down to this has been in harmony with that decision.

It is utterly useless, Mr. Speaker, aye, more than that, it is almost criminal, for this Congress, therefore, to undertake to unsettle the title to these vast areas of land in the various States where land grants have been given to the State for such purposes.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I will ask the gentleman if he does not know that an individual could not raise that question, because it was a collateral question, which he had not the right to raise, and that nobody but the State or sovereignty could do it, and that the State or sovereignty always can do it?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But in the case that I have cited the Supreme Court decided that the State of Wisconsin was the proper plaintiff, and not the United States Government, as was contended by the defendant in that case.

Mr. HUTCHESON. But the principle applied that the defendant could not raise that question.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The State had to show title in the first instance in order to maintain its standing in court. Does not the gentleman know that before the value of the logs could be recovered title must be shown in the plaintiff? If the contention of the gentleman from Texas is correct there could be no recovery, because there would be no title in the State of Wisconsin. Title in the State of Wisconsin to maintain trover to recover for the value of the logs mentioned in that case would be title sufficient to convey rights to individual purchasers, or to the railway company, as the case might be.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. QUIGG. If it is true that an individual can not bring an action, does not that constitute an especial reason why we should defend his rights?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I grant that the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] is correct in his query. But, Mr. Speaker, from any and every standpoint this bill should be defeated.

As I stated in my opening remarks, when this bill forfeiting more than 50,000,000 acres of land was passed in the Fifty-first Congress, it was supposed that that would end land-grant forfeiture bills in this House forever, and thousands upon thousands of settlers have acquired title to real estate that is involved in this bill, whose title would be unsettled, and who would be compelled to go into court to assert their rights if this bill should become a law.

This bill is in the interest of land lawyers, and no other class of citizens. No fair-minded and honest man can afford to support it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LACEY. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS].

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, owing to the limited time which is allowed for discussing the important questions involved in this bill, it will be necessary to condense as much as possible the remarks which I now propose to submit to the House.

In order to determine the wisdom and justice of this bill, it is proper, in my judgment, to look back prior to the time when laws making railway grants were enacted by Congress. We may then be able to see the occasion which led to those enactments, and to the concessions which were so generally made to railway companies throughout the United States and in Territories for the construction of new and extended lines of railway.

At that time, it will be remembered, the extremities of this country were certainly more than 3,000 miles apart. There was no means of ready transit or communication between those extremities. The Northwest was increasing with population. There was a desire to make the land of those States and Territories immediately available to the people of the United States. It could not be done under the then existing mode of transit, in such a manner as to satisfy the requirements and the demands of the migrating portion of the population.

The consequence was that it became important at once for Congress to undertake in some manner to secure the construction of railways from the East to the Western portion of the country. At that time the only rules and regulations, the only obligations binding one part of the country to the other so far as the extreme West was concerned, were the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. There was no means of intercommunication or of reasonably fair transit from one part of the country to the other. Persons who went to the Northwest or to the Pacific coast for settlement were substantially isolated and cut off from the residue of the country.

In military operations there was no means of rapidly moving the Army from one part of the country to the other, and it became important, in the judgment of the people, as well as of the authorities, that some measures should be taken for the construction and extension of railways into this Western and Northwestern portion of the country. The subject was made a matter of discussion and examination, but private capital was too cautious to engage in an attempt to construct so formidable and extensive a work as a railway through to the Pacific Ocean.

It was appalled at the idea, and of course added to that was the probability that there was no fair amount of revenue that could be expected to be returned from the earnings and operations of such a railway. It could not accordingly be constructed by individual enterprise. That was entirely out of the question. And when the sentiment of the people upon the subject seemed to concenter in the necessity of the construction of railways of this character across the Continent, the attention of Congress became specially directed to it, and it was found important to consider upon what terms, so far as the public was concerned, these great enterprises could be constructed, maintained, and carried into effect.

Where private capital was entirely inadequate to produce the range of improvements which were necessary, then it became a matter of indispensable requirement that Congress should interfere; and inasmuch as it could not advance money to aid and assist in the construction of these great works, it proposed to concede to the companies that were formed for the purpose of constructing these works a large amount of public territory, which in the end it was hoped would make these enterprises successful.

These concessions on the part of Congress to these corporations were made upon a fair and bona fide consideration. It was a necessity for the promotion of the prosperity of the country, for the purpose of securing its unity, that these railroads should be constructed. The duty was imperative on the part of Congress that some assistance of a public character should be extended to the construction of these great works, and the only means by which Congress could lend its assistance and the desire and wishes of the people could be carried into effect by the aid and assistance of Congress was to make concessions of public lands to the corporations that were proposing to construct these railways; and these concessions were made upon the consideration that if the railways were constructed the Government and the people would receive thereby a fair equivalent for the value of the lands which were conceded to the corporations to aid and assist in these great works. Besides that, Congress simply conceded every alternate section of land, with the expectation that the construction of these works would also enhance the value and salability of those sections reserved by the Government.

In all respects it acted judiciously and carefully in providing means so far as the concessions of land were concerned for the indorsement of the construction of these great enterprises. It was by this means that these corporations were brought into existence, as much at the instance of Congress and of the masses of the people of the United States as it was at the instance of the persons who were immediately connected with the construction and promotion of these enterprises.

The lands were not available at once. They could not be sold, and the money realized from them that was necessary for the purpose of creating these railways. The consequence was that the corporations went into the market and obtained subscribers to their stock, and the advancement of money, upon the faith that the Government would stand by its concession, and these people in the end would be reimbursed for their advances, and that they would be secured some measure of profit for their advances by the fact that this land should finally be sold at a profit, and their proceeds made available for the payment of the indebtedness incurred by the companies.

Now, to pass a bill of this character after the railways have been built, and to attempt to forfeit this land, if that can be done, is certainly a most transparent injustice to the companies and to the people who have advanced their moneys in this manner, and who have relied upon the faith of the United States in maintaining the concessions that were made for these objects.

But, without pursuing this subject so far as to intrench further upon the little time I have, I desire to call the attention of the House to another matter which arises here, and stands directly in the way of the enactment of a bill of this character, and it is this:

While the law provided in the case of these railways that the land should be forfeited unless the railways were constructed by a particular time specified in the law, yet when that time arrived and the railways had been partially built but were not completed, there was no action taken on the part of Congress or on the part of any Department of the Government looking to the forfeiture of these lands by reason of the fact of this delay which had intervened. On the contrary, the authorities——

Mr. DUNN. May I ask the gentleman a question? Is it not a principle of law that a limitation of that character does not run against the public, for the benefit of the people.

Mr. DANIELS. No, sir; I do not think it is. I think the public are chargeable with laches precisely the same as an individual; if they rest upon their rights without asserting them, the same as if they had no rights at all, then it is laches, and when they are in a position in which an individual can not get relief in court of chancery the people would be in precisely the same condition.

But this is what I desire to call the attention of the House to, and that is that Congress and the Departments of the Government failed to assert a right to take any advantage of this default, if a default took place, in the construction of these works, but permitted them to go on until the railways were fully constructed in many instances, and which are to be affected by this bill.

So that if the Government can forfeit the right to these lands and reinvest itself with the title. then it has not only the land which was given to aid in and indirectly devoted to the construction of the railways, but it has all the advantages of the railways too. Sir, there is no law, no administration of law, in any tribunal of this country or of England that has ever sanctioned a measure of iniquity like that

Now, take the case of an individual. Suppose my friend here has 100 acres of land that he desires to have cleared. He conveys to another person 50 acres upon the consideration that this other person shall clear the 100 acres in a certain time, and if he does not clear it within the time the deed for the 50 acres is to be void. The man fails to fulfill the contract within the time; at the expiration of the time the land is not cleared, but it is partially cleared. The man has performed in part his agreement. The man who deeded the property which was to be cleared does not intervene and make any objection to the continued prosecution of the work.

The man who received the conveyance and who holds his property subject to the right of forfeiture for his default goes on and completes the work; he clears the 100 acres. Now, will any person insist that the law would permit the grantor under such circumstances to come in and insist upon a forfeiture of the grant by reason of the nonfulfillment of the condition within the time originally specified?

Or suppose, further, that a person is engaged in building a house for another, and a contract has been made that the construction must be finished within a certain time. The builder fails to complete the work by that time, but the owner permits him to go on and finish the house. Under such circumstances the law, so far as my observation has extended, will not permit the person for whom the house was built to come in and say, after the work is finished, he having failed to make objection at the expiration of the limited time, that there had been a failure to perform the work and that under the circumstances he is entitled to take the benefit of the work done and materials furnished without paying the compensation agreed to be paid.

There are no principles which can be applied to individuals under circumstances of this character which are not equally applicable to a proceeding on the part of the United States Government. The law will not permit either a government, a corporation, or an individual to allow a person to proceed with the performance of obligations of this character after the time has expired when the performance should, by the contract, be completed, and then when the work has been done endeavor to avoid the payment of a proper consideration for the services thus rendered. The law is not chargeable with such injustice; and this is probably the first occasion when so iniquitous a measure as this has been brought before Congress for its approval.

When the act of 1890 was passed it was supposed that was the end of the attempt to forfeit the property of these railroad companies for a failure to fully construct their railways in time; and that act was made applicable only to so much of the railways as was not at the time constructed. And the committee in their report on this bill use this language with reference to that act:

It practically gave the roads all they claimed, and took back what as a rule they did not want.

Thus it is conceded by the language of the report itself that the effect of the previous act was to leave all the property in the hands of the corporations that had carried out in the best of faith these enterprises for which they were to receive these rewards, and that these companies were to remain subsequently to that time undisturbed.

Now, the principle is also well settled that Congress has no power to interefere with or disturb rights of this character by subsequent legislation. This bill has not only that avowed purpose, but it seeks to embrace in the forfeiture all the lands that were conceded and conveyed by the previous acts to railway companies which have completed their roads but failed to construct them within the time provided.

It is conceded upon the face of the bill that the work which was to be performed by these companies has since been done; that the public has received the consideration for which the lands were given; that all the advantages expected to be secured have been obtained; that no wrong has been inflicted upon the public in any respect whatever, but that it has gained everything which it expected to gain through these concessions of public property.

And now, after this result has been secured, it is proposed that Congress shall come in and say to these railway companies, "It is true that you have substantially fulfilled your obligations, with our assent, you have supplied the people and the country those railways which by the laws making these concessions of property you were to give them as a recompense for such property; yet inasmuch as you failed to complete your roads within the exact hour, or day, or month, or year when it was provided that the roads should be completed, we will forfeit all this property and leave you to sustain the burdens to which you have been subjected in the expectation of reinbursement from the proceeds of these lands."

There is no instance, it seems to me, where there has been so flagrant an attempt on the part of the legislative body of a government of this character, or of any government, to overrule the bona fide action of individuals or corporations in constructing works for the use of the public, and to forfeit their rights and revest them in the Government on account of mere delay.

But, sir, this can not be done by legislation. If there has been a forfeiture of any part of this property, the Government of the United States is in a position to recover it. The forfeiture can not be created or declared by a bill of this character. It does not appertain to the province or jurisdiction of this House or of the legislative department of the General Government to declare a forfeiture where, in point of fact, there is no ground for such forfeiture.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. DANIELS. My time is about to expire and I must proceed.

I wish to call attention to a remark made in a case decided by the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin in Rowan vs. The State (30 Wis., 146, 147). The subject of discussion was the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and a corporation is a person within the meaning of this provision of the Constitution. The court in that case, construing that provision, said:

> The better and larger definition of due process of law is that it means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice. By the law of the land the meaning is that any citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property and immunities, under the protection of general rules which govern society. And the terms law of the land, and due process of law, mean that, where rights are acquired by the citizen under the existing law, there is no power in any branch of the Government to take them away, but when they are held contrary to the existing law, or are forfeited by its violation, then they may be taken from him, not by an act of the Legislature, but in the due administration of the law itself before the judicial tribunals of the State.

According to these principles there is no room whatever for legislation of this character. Either the right to forfeit this property exists or it does not exist; and whether it does or not is a question for the courts to determine—not for the Legislature of the Union, under the authority given by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LACEY. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. McRAE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just addressed the House seems to be impressed with the idea that the grantees under the several acts of Congress making appropriation of public lands in aid of railway construction have acted in the best of faith; that this beneficent policy of the Government has been productive of the most magnificent results; that the Government has obtained as the price of its lands the systems of railway which have been constructed, and that now it would be in bad faith—dishonest, so to speak—for the Government to seek to recover any of these lands after it has obtained the benefit of the construction of the roads.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman certainly can not have read and must be ignorant of the history of these railway land grants. He must be ignorant of the fact that the beneficence of the Government has been prostituted to the very basest purposes; that the land grants which have been given by the Government in aid of the construction of roads have to a great extent been filched by the corporators and the benefit of those lands converted to their own use.

Why, sir, look at the condition of these subsidized roads—these roads which the Government has aided not only with immense land grants, but with immense money subsidies. The constructors, the men who built them, the men who manipulated and handled them, are the millionaires whose wealth is the wonder of the nation, while the roads which they have built are in the hands of receivers. The land grants have not been devoted to the purposes for which they were intended by the United States when they were given, but have been diverted to the individual pockets of the men who have manipulated the roads.

Sir, the gentleman was perfectly correct when he said that in advance of the opening up of the lands, in advance of the construction of the roads, in advance of the right to sell the lands, these men issued mortgage bonds upon this property in order to secure for themselves the advantage which was to be derived therefrom if by any chance the roads should not be constructed.

In the case of the Union Pacific Railroad there was an issue of subsidy bonds to the extent of $10,000,000, divided among the corporators and stockholders as a bonus, upon which that railroad company paid 10 per cent interest for many years, the amount thus paid equaling the principal of the bonds, all of which went into the pockets of the manipulators, who were in this way taking advantage of the beneficence of the Government and prostituting to their own individual gain the aid which had been extended by the Government.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is there any proposition here to forfeit any grant which was made to any State or any road that was aided by a grant of the credit of the Government or by a money grant? The gentleman has been talking about the Union and Central Pacific roads. As I understand, they are not involved in this bill.

Mr. BOATNER. I was simply replying to the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] based upon the question of good faith and honesty. He urged that it was wrong for us to take these lands, and I want to present to him and to this House the absurdity, if I may so speak, of extending equity, consideration, forbearance, beyond the terms of the contract, to corporations which are said to be soulless.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But you have been attacking the Union and Central Pacific roads, which received bond aid, and whose lands, as I understand, you do not propose to forfeit to the extent of an acre.

Mr. BOATNER. I have stated to the gentleman that I have brought in this illustration in opposition to the argument of the gentleman from New York that these people are entitled to consideration, equity, mercy, so to speak, at our hands.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But you are talking about the wrong people.

Mr. BOATNER. I think not.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. You are talking about the wicked people that the bill does not touch. Now, why do you not address yourself to that other branch of the question?

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman from Illinois thinks he can make this speech better than I can, perhaps I had better yield the floor to him.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I rather think I could. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER. I expect so, from your standpoint. But doubtless as there is time on that side of the House for the consideration of this matter, you can get all the time you want, and I can not consent that you shall dictate the line of my argument for me.

I repeat now, I refer to this because of the plea made by the gentleman from New York to the House that we would be doing a great injustice by undertaking to adopt such legislation as this, in view of the fact that since these grants were made, and as an equivalent for the grants, as he seems to think, we have received the roads.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is an absolute waste of time to argue that the courts have held that the failure by the grantee to perform the conditions-subsequent of the contract does not ipse facto forfeit the contract. No one denies that proposition. It is nothing more than a cause of action on the part of the grantor to claim the forfeiture by reason of such failure. It is likewise a well settled principle of law that where a grantor permits the grantee to peform the conditions-subsequent, after the time named in the contract, that he is estopped by allowing that to be done, and can not thereafter claim the forfeiture on that ground. That has been the law as between individuals, I believe, always. There is no question about that.

But the question here presented is whether the United States Government, in the exercise of its sovereign power, has not a greater right to claim the forfeiture of a contract which by its specific terms, and in unequivocal language, declares that the grant shall be null and void and of no avail whatever unless the conditions specified in the contract are complied with.

I have admitted all along that the Government of the United States can not exercise its right to the prejudice of innocent third persons. If the Government makes a grant to A B, which permits certain property to be disposed of to another party or parties, which is a grant, known in the language of the law as a grant in præsenti, and gives possession to A B, with authority to sell or mortgage, and the Government subsequently revokes the grant on the ground that the "condition subsequent" had not been complied with, the purchasers or mortgagers could successfully maintain that their contracts with the grantee were authorized by the act of Congress and that they were not affected by the laches or fault of the grantee.

But the condition presented here is entirely different. The Government has reserved the right in express terms to resume these grants in the event of a failure to perform the condition subsequent, and if any right may remain in the grantee then the Government has the right to resume possession by the forfeiture of the property.

Of course if the grantee has parted with it by lawful title before the right of forfeiture is exercised there is nothing to forfeit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me ask where is the equity in arguing that the Government shall leave that property in the hands of a corporation which has not complied with its condition, instead of taking it back for the benefit of the people? Will anyone say that the railways have not been more than sufficiently rewarded for whatever they have done in the construction of their lines? Will anyone say that the Government is under any obligation to the Union Pacific Railroad, that owes to-day not only every dollar of the subsidy bonds issued in aid of the construction of the line, but every dollar of the interest on these bonds, from the day they were issued until this time?

Will anyone say that the Government is under any obligation to the Central Pacific Railroad, or that it is under any obligation, morally or equitably, to the Northern Pacific Railroad, each of which roads received more from the Government than was sufficient to build and equip the entire line, and to leave them the property, a mere gift from the generous public of the United States?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. BOATNER. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas to yield to me a few minutes longer.

Mr. McRAE. I yield ten minutes longer to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Louisiana now allow me a question as to the scope of the bill? I desire to obtain information from him.

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Take, for instance, the Northern Pacific Road, which I understand commences at Duluth and runs substantially to the Pacific Ocean, and which was not completed in time: Does this bill forfeit all the lands along the line of that road granted by act of Congress, from Duluth clear through to Puget Sound, or only the land along the road coterminous with the line of the road that was not completed within the time fixed in the granting act?

Mr. BOATNER. This bill only forfeits the lands which were not earned within the time. The terms of the granting act provide that as the roads are constructed certain areas of the public lands shall be given to them. When another section is completed and certified, they get the additional land subsidy, and this act strikes only at that portion of the subsidy claimed to be earned beyond the time fixed in the original law or granting act.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does my friend think that we have the power to forfeit from Duluth clear west?

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly you would not have the power to forfeit any except that which was not earned in the time fixed by law.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But was not the grant as a whole?

Mr. BOATNER. No; the grant was not as a whole, if the law provided that upon the construction of a section of 20 miles of the road so many acres of land should be granted to the road. That land was earned, even if no more road was ever constructed. Then, if another section was constructed, why, the road earned so much more land, and so on until the limit was reached. The road not constructed at the time the limit was reached did not earn the grant allowed for that portion of the road.

Mr. HERMANN. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, as to the Northern Pacific, the time expired when the road had reached Bismarck, in Dakota; so that, under this bill, all the lands conterminous with the completed line of road westward from Dakota into the State of Washington will be forfeited, a reach of over 1,000 miles.

Mr. BOATNER. If that be the fact, it would be a misfortune to the company. It would be by the terms of the contract and by reason of the law of the case and by reason of the fact that the railroad company did not earn the land according to the terms of the donation made to it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The original act gave them a certain length of time. They did not complete it within that time. A subsequent act of Congress extended the time. Yet this bill will reach back to the time fixed in the original act, will it not?

Mr. BOATNER. I submit to the gentleman that that is mere quibbling.

Mr. NORTHWAY. How is it?

Mr. BOATNER. This bill only forfeits the lands which were not earned in time.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Under the original act?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; under the law, whatever the law was.

Mr. BOATNER. This act refers to the acts conveying these grants. It does not refer to any particular grant. It refers to all the acts making the grants.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come down to the question of these State grants, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] cites the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman in support of his contention that Congress is powerless to revoke the grants to the States in aid of the construction of railroads. As I stated yesterday, there is a stipulation in every one of these acts to this effect:

That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by said State only in manner following, that is to say, that a quantity of land, not exceeding 120 sections for each of said roads, and included within a continuous length of 20 miles of each of said roads, may be sold; and when the governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any 20 continuous miles of any of said roads is completed, then another quantity of land hereby granted, not to exceed 120 sections for each of said roads having 20 continuous miles completed as aforesaid, and included within a a continuous length of 20 miles of each of such roads, may be sold; and so, from time to time, until said roads are completed; and if any of said roads is not completed within ten years, no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States.

Now, I ask as a matter of common sense, if the governors of the several States had any other authority to sell this land than that conferred by the act of Congress, and if the act of Congress expressly provides that they shall sell no land after a certain time, upon what principle of law or common sense is it to be contended that the sales are valid, or that the title is carried out of the United States to the vendees of the State, or to the railroad company?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the language of the Supreme Court in the Schulenberg case, on pages 62 and 63. On page 62 I find the following:

The provision in the act of Congress of 1856, that all lands remaining unsold after ten years shall revert to the United States if the road be not then completed, is no more than a provision that the grant shall be void if a condition-subsequent be not performed.

On page 63, in speaking of that, the decision says:

A cessation of sales in that event is implied in the condition that the lands shall then revert; if the condition be not enforced the power to sell continues as before its breach, limited only by the objects of the grant and the manner of sale prescribed in the act.

Mr. BOATNER. My answer to that is, it is a clear obiter dictum, and that the question was not before the court.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Oh, well——

Mr. BOATNER. I admit that if that authority is law, it is dead against the position which I assume. There is no way of dodging that. I admit that if it is law; it is conclusive against the position which I take; but I say that it is not the law; that it has not the force of an adjudication, because the point it appears to decide was not involved in any question before the court. Now, if the gentleman will not interrupt me, in the Schulenberg case, which he cites, the agent of the State of Wisconsin had replevied some timber which had been cut upon railway land grants.

The parties who had the logs set up a dual defense, that the land either belonged to the railway company or belonged to the United States, that the State of Wisconsin had parted with its title to the railway company, and hence had no standing in court, or, if it had not, under the terms of the granting act the land had reverted to the United States. The question was then surely one of title, whether the United States owned the land, whether the State of Wisconsin owned the land, or whether the railway company owned the land.

The court said the railway company did not own it, because the State of Wisconsin was without power to part with the title conferred upon it by the United States, except on the terms and conditions carried by the granting act. Those terms and conditions were, as I have stated, that the land could be sold for the benefit of the road as the road was constructed, in sections, and that as the grant was the sole basis of the power of the State to sell, the State could not go beyond the conditions of the grant, which condition had not been performed.

Therefore the title of the State had not vested in the railroad. The title remained in the State simply because Congress had not forfeited it, simply because Congress had not taken it back. The State of Wisconsin held it as a trustee of Congress for certain purposes. The deed of trust or mandate, or power of attorney, authorized the State to sell within a certain time. Now, there was nothing before the court to lead the court to say that the State of Wisconsin could go on thereafter and make title to that road. That was no element of the discussion between them.

The only discussion was as to whether the land then belonged to the State, the United States, or the railroad company. The court held that the legal title was in the State, because the grant was in præsenti, which carries the power of disposition upon certain terms and conditions, and Congress not having taken back the title, after the expiration of the time within which the State could sell the land, the legal title rested in the State, subject to revocation at the option of Congress.

Therefore I say that that expression of opinion of the court there is a clear obiter dictum, and we are entitled to have a decision of the Supreme Court upon this vital and important question.

The SPEAKER protempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me just one minute?

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman will have to get it from the other side. I have promised all my time. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] twenty minutes.

[Mr. HOLMAN withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Speaker, the fact that the district which I represent in this body is very largely interested in this question of the forfeiture of railroad lands—that extending through my district from north to south, nearly or quite 400 miles, and from one boundary to the other, these railroad grants have been made, and that thousands of people there are vitally interested in this matter—this is my only excuse for presuming to address the House on this occasion. As I am not a lawyer, I have no idea of contributing to the legal information of members on this question.

The whole debate thus far has been confined, I believe, to the lawyers of the House. I have taken the floor at this time in order to ascertain, if possible, what would be the effect if this bill is enacted into law; that is my only reason for presuming to take part in the discussion.

The gentleman from Alabama, who, I believe, is ranked as a good lawyer, said yesterday:

> The law does not take cognizance of the fact that the rancher is not acquainted with the law. The presumption is that all men know the law; and ignorance of the law is no foundation for equitable relief.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama would require the ordinary rancher or pioneer to know more law than any lawyer in this House or all of them put together.

I listened yesterday very attentively to the debate as carried on by the very able lawyers who participated in it.

Now, if these legal gentlemen had only agreed upon the effect of the bill—what it meant—it would have been perfectly clear to all of us, and we would have known whether to vote for or against the bill. But what one able lawyer declared to be the law, another able lawyer disputed and declared that the law was entirely different. And so, Mr. Speaker, I went away from the House at the close of the debate yesterday as much mystified, as much in doubt, and in fact even more so than when the debate opened, and I believe that was the condition that prevailed with everybody who heard the debate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote to forfeit all unearned lands granted to railroads, and I think every member of the House would vote for that proposition standing alone; that is to say, all lands that should, in justice toward all citizens, be restored to the public domain. But I hesitate to vote for this bill as it stands from the fear that it unsettles the titles to many farms and will do a great wrong to many thousands of settlers who have in years past, acting under their best judgment and always in accordance with the law, as they were led to understand by the representatives of the United States Government, have gone on to public lands or have bought lands of corporations, and built themselves homes.

Now, then, if the purpose of this bill is to forfeit the unearned lands, and is not to wrong or disturb the titles of those American citizens who have acquired their rights under the laws, its supporters can not object to making the bill as absolutely clear in this respect, protecting these settlers, as any human enactment can be. I, although not a lawyer, am pretty well satisfied that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] will make the bill clear, and a refusal to incorporate this amendment, or some amendment substantially the same, I must take to mean that the object of this bill is not the forfeiture of unearned lands, but has another object. I have heard it intimated that it was somewhat in the character of a political bill, to be launched at this particular time.

I will not so regard it until I am forced to. No political consideration will influence my vote upon this bill; I will unhesitatingly vote against it, regardless of the popularity of the cry against and the denunciation of railroad corporations, unless I am convinced that it is a just bill and for a good purpose. As the bill is presented I will not vote for it, because we had the testimony yesterday of able lawyers supporting this bill, that it would in certain cases absolutely confiscate the farms and homes of many honest settlers. Here are the words of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], who is supporting this bill:

> It will not interfere with the right of any settler who has bought from a railroad company that had authority to sell, but it does propose to take back to the General Government all the lands granted to the railroad companies that have not conformed to the terms and conditions of the grant, and thereby earned the land.

"Had authority to sell." I call your special attention to these words in this connection.

It was admitted yesterday that by the terms of this bill no security was offered to anyone who had purchased more than 320 acres of land; that it absolutely confiscated all the lands purchased by anyone in excess of that amount. Now, I want to state to the House some conditions that exist in Southern and Central California. Two years ago I stopped at a small station on the Southern Pacific Railroad, and taking a carriage, drove for 10 miles across the desert plains in Kern County. As I say, it was across an absolute desert; way out upon this plain we came to a place of about 20 acres that had been improved.

A man of some wealth had gone there and put down an artesian well; got a good flow of water; threw up an embankment of the earth, 3 or 4 feet high, constructing a large reservoir; he then planted 5 acres of it to alfalfa. He was just beginning to cut his seventh crop of alfalfa from that piece of 5 acres. He had previously, that season, cut 40 tons of first-class alfalfa hay from these 5 acres. He had fruit trees of nearly all descriptions growing luxuriantly.

He had demonstrated what could be done with the desert by the aid of water and artificial irrigation. There was no other improvement within 10 miles of him. Now, then, the ordinary American citizen or individual who goes upon the public lands to make a home, could not have gone out on that desert and made that improvement.

The well cost nearly a thousand dollars. To handle that kind of land there must be some kind of an organization of a number of men. Well, the result here was this: The land as it lay was not worth a cent an acre; would not support a jack-rabbit; it is in an arid section, where the rainfall is very slight. Men of means purchased large tracts of the railroad company, not only in the grant, but in the limits of the indemnity lands. They spent many thousands of dollars in bringing the water on these lands. They then offered these lands to settlers at various prices, $10 and $20 and upwards an acre oftentimes, and hundreds of settlers have thus purchased their homes. They are in most cases given long time and a reasonable rate of interest to pay for their homes, and with the water upon that land they are as absolutely certain of succeeding as anyone in any other legitimate business can be.

These vast plains never can be settled to any extent by individual efforts. They can only be brought under cultivation in the way that they are doing it now. Now, sir, as I understand the able lawyers of the House this bill will confiscate the property of many of these settlers.

The act referred to in the bill, the act of 1890, of which I understand the gentleman from Indiana said at the time it was passed that "settled this whole question" of the protection of railroad lands. The gentleman must have been mistaken in the statement he made, otherwise there would be no reason whatever for the presentation of the pending bill.

Under that act the citizen must have possession of land—

> under deed, written contract with, or license from the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed prior to January 1, 1888—

That is six years ago, and although going upon the lands, doing the best they could, settling on them under the law as far as they could get title from the Land Office, they are estopped by this bill from any rights which they may have acquired. The gentleman from Indiana said that this bill would effectually settle the matter for all time. He must have been mistaken, as this shows.

Others have gone onto the lands, in the language of this act of 1890—> with bona fide intent to secure title thereto by purchase from the State or corporation * * * if they have made improvements prior to the 1st day of January, 1890.

That is four years ago. So that as it stands to-day every one of these people on the lands in question, that had not commenced the improvements on their lands within the four years, will find them confiscated by the provisions of this bill.

Now, I not going to consider the wrongs done in all of the years past in the granting of millions of acres of lands and the issuing of bonds to these railroads. But to punish the railroad companies and ourselves for our own negligence I do not propose to walk over the prostrate industries and assist in the destruction of the farms of thousands of settlers which, as we understand from all of the lawyers, this bill does. The railroads have secured millions of acres of good lands. This bill may restore some to the public domain, but it unsettles the question of titles of many settlers on the public lands.

If I understood the several able lawyers yesterday this bill provides for the absolute annulment of United States patents in certain cases. That was the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana, because it is admitted that in certain cases the land has been sold, and I believe patents granted where the railroad company was not authorized by the terms of the grant to do so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said before—perhaps it is unnecessary to repeat it—I am not a lawyer, but having in view the assertion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] as to the duty of everyone to know the law, I have read and have been told a great many times that the foundation of all law was a contract, and I believe that the foundation upon which all civilization rests is the sacredness of contracts, and when contracts are lightly repudiated there is no basis left for confidence between men, nor security for property or person. We should hesitate long before we unsettle the foundation of our Government. It should be known that when the Government of the United States makes a contract it must be fulfilled, unless it can clearly shown that willful and deliberate fraud has been accomplished.

It is the most serious charge that I or anyone can bring against the Democratic party to-day, that it has deliberately, by the passage of the Wilson bill, repudiated without notice the solemn contract this Government entered into with its own citizens in respect to the sugar bounty. A contract, not only implied, but expressed in words, enacted into law, fixing the time that the contract should begin to run, and the time it should end. After the citizens, relying upon the faith and contract of the United States, had expended large sums of money to build factories, and as in many parts of my district, the farmers had organized companies among themselves to build factories, had prepared and planted their land, then the Government abrogates the contract it made.

In view of this outrage, what security, what guaranty can the people of the United States have that this Government, while administered by the Democratic party, will regard any pledge, any contract, or keep faith with anyone? They can have none. If such a contract can be lightly repudiated, any other can be, and it is not surprising, perhaps, that the proposition to annul United States patents should so coolly be proposed to this House.

I am confident, Mr. Chairman, that at the first opportunity offered the people of the United States will repudiate any party that repudiates and nullifies the contracts entered into by the United States with its citizens.

And now, I repeat, if the supporters of this bill have but the single purpose in view of forfeiting the unearned land grants that should be forfeited, they will not refuse to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, which makes the bill clear. If this is not done we have reason to believe that the bill is introduced for political purposes, and I shall not vote for it. I have lived for a quarter of a century among the people who sent me here; they know my position upon the railroad question, and that no clamor will deter me from doing what I think is right in this matter. Make it clear that the rights of innocent purchasers and owners of these lands are secured and I am with you.

I was advised by a friend to vote for this bill anyway, even if not amended; that it was better to vote wrong than to vote right and be obliged to explain. Well, when I am right I can afford to explain.

One gentleman, a good lawyer and who has sat upon the bench as a judge, in conversation yesterday, admitted that the bill would unsettle the title of many farmers, but he would vote to forfeit all the lands and then let the innocent settlers and purchasers apply to the United States for relief.

But, Mr. Speaker, in view of my efforts to obtain justice for the 1,200 settlers on public lands, on the indemnity lands in California, I do not think it is a very promising outlook for the settlers to proceed that way. The United States is pretty slow. I shall not vote to add to the number of settlers to be placed in the position of those of Tulare and Kern, especially when the able lawyers of this House declare it is a bad precedent to establish, that the Government should keep faith and do justice to the settler on public lands to whom it has issued a patent.

Gentlemen talk of the robberies and wrongs committed upon the people by the railroad corporations. That these wrongs have been committed no one denies. But are we going to right these wrongs by now robbing thousands of settlers who have become innocent purchasers of these lands? And this is what this bill, without the amendment I have alluded to, admittedly does.

Mr. LACEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the bill pending before the House, as I understand its provisions, contemplates the absolute confiscation of more than 50,000,000 acres of land. The questions presented to us are, first, the expediency of this proposed legislation; and, secondly, the legal right of the Government to carry out the provisions of the bill proposed to be enacted.

I shall not take very much time upon the first part of this inquiry; it is enough for me to know that the Congress of the United States in past years has deemed it wise, in order to encourage the building of public thoroughfares to the Pacific Ocean, as well as in other parts of the country, to make a donation of the public land to certain corporations as an inducement to the promoters of such enterprises to carry them on; and I take it when Congress has given the public lands to a syndicate of gentlemen who have undertaken the construction of the railroad, and have gone on and constructed it, that they received that grant upon a legal and for a valuable consideration.

The suggestion was made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] a few moments ago that all of these gentlemen had become very rich out of the proceeds of these lands, and that they had used the lands for their own private interest and purposes; that the sale of the lands had simply brought the money into their own pockets rather than those of other parties. But I submit that that consideration does not touch the merits of the bill presented. If the lands were granted to these men as an inducement to go on and construct the road, the lands belong to them, and they had a perfect right, after they had complied with the conditions they undertook to perform, to put the proceeds of the sales into their own private pockets.

If they have become wealthy in building these railroads they have done nothing more nor less than all men do who engage in enterprises of this kind. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we lose sight of the point of this bill when we undertake to travel outside and to condemn the men who have built the railroads of this country. It is not my province, it is not my duty, nor have I any desire, to commend the management of railroad builders in the United States.

It is enough for me to know that, animated by a zeal that is worthy of the best of causes, they have given us four or five transcontinental lines to the Pacific Ocean. They have established a dozen States that are represented on the floor of this House; have brought them within the pale of civilization; have dotted the hillsides all over them with the homes of happy, contented families; have brought to the aggregate wealth of this country millions upon millions of dollars, and I think that these facts alone are enough to atone for the "criminality" that my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] charges them with.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman maintain that it was right and proper for the incorporators of these roads to divert to their individual benefit the land grants which were given in aid of the construction of the roads?

Mr. POWERS. Most assuredly I do, Mr. Speaker. If the Government gave these lands to these railroad companies—and when the gentleman says "incorporators" I suppose he means the companies——

Mr. BOATNER. Yes, the managers.

Mr. POWERS. They gave these lands to them with the understanding that they should go on and build these railroads, and the lands became their property. The lands were the quid pro quo given them for the building of the roads, and if the lands were their property, they had the right to sell the lands and put the proceeds in their pockets.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another consideration connected with this matter. The great railroads of this country that have reached the stage of completion have been compelled, most of them, to execute mortgages upon their franchises, upon their properties, and I suppose it to be the fact, although I have not given special attention to the matter, that every great railroad corporation in this country that has been aided by the Government has mortgaged the lands to raise money to build the road.

Now, a mortgage is just as sacred in the eye of the law as an out-and-out deed. The rights of these mortgagees are just as complete and perfect as the right of a settler to a section of land which he has bought and upon which he has built his homestead. So that when we consider the question of expediency in connection with this bill, we are bound to recognize the equitable right of these security holders who have advanced their money by way of mortgage upon these lands, in order to enable the companies to carry out the purposes for which they were organized.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker. There are a great number of people in this country who have taken the stock of these corporations—widows, orphans, guardians, and trustees. People all over the country have invested their money in the stock of these corporations, and they have done it upon the faith and upon the trust that these lands constitute a part of the assets of the corporations, so that their money has been advanced upon the strength of that security. Now, this bill proposes to throw a cloud over their title. It proposes to impair the validity of their obligations against these companies by reducing the companies still lower in the scale of insolvency than they have already reached. So that I think, upon the score of expediency, it is entirely clear that there is no present call for the passage of this bill.

Now, upon the legal question, it is said that the Government has the right to confiscate these lands, because, forsooth, the railroad corporations did not complete their work within the specified time fixed in their charters. In other words, if they were twenty-four hours behind the time in the completion of a railroad, it is plain that we should declare a forfeiture of their land grants. Is there any sense or propriety or decency in such a proposition? It seems to me not. I do not know what the language of the various grants is. There are a great many grants, I suppose.

This bill not only reaches grants given to the roads that run across the continent, but I see by the map that was exhibited here yesterday that it covers Louisiana, Alabama, and a great many other States. I believe pretty much the whole of the States of Iowa and Minnesota are embraced within the sweeping provisions of this bill. I do not know, and I do not undertake, therefore, to argue what the provisions in the grants to these various railroad corporations were; but I have before me a copy of the act granting the charter to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and I undertake to say that there is no right whatever reserved to the Government to declare a forfeiture in that case.

Section 3 of the act of 1864 which chartered this company and made this land grant provides:

That there be and hereby is granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, every alternate section of public lands.

* * * * * * *

The conditions upon which that grant are made are specified in sections 8 and 9 of that act. Section 8 is:

That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein are so made and given to and accepted by said Northern Pacific Railroad Company upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: That the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than 50 miles per year after the second year, and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the whole road by the 4th day of July, A. D. 1876.

SEC. 9. That the United States make the several conditioned grants herein, and that the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company accept the same, upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the conditions hereof and allow the same to continue for upwards of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States, by its Congress, may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the only penalty named in the act granting aid to the Northern Pacific Railroad if it failed to complete its road within the stipulated time is found in the concluding words of section 9:

The United States, by its Congress, may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road.

Not a word or syllable can be found anywhere in the act that looks to a forfeiture of the land grant.

It is a matter of common knowledge to laymen as well as lawyers that penal clauses in statutes are to be strictly construed. Nothing can be added to or taken from the consequences specified, which are to follow wrongful acts or omissions of duty. If the penal clause names the consequence which is to follow, that and that alone is the only punishment available to the complaining party. In this case the right of the Government to intervene—to turn off the Northern Pacific Company, and proceed itself in any necessary way to complete the road is the one single and only possible result of the failure of the Northern Pacific Company to discharge the duty imposed upon it by the act.

If the Government had intended that a forfeiture of its land grant should follow a default in this behalf, it should have so ordained. It did not so ordain, therefore it can not now ordain it in this ex post facto legislation.

It may be agreed that under the wording of this penal clause in section 9 the Government might, if it deemed it necessary to the completion of the road, annul the land grant and turn it over to other parties who would complete the road. Such a contention I concede would be plausible, and I do not now stop to say that it would be illogical.

But a close inspection of this language in section 9 shows that the only right reserved under it to the Government is to do those things necessary to insure the speedy completion of the road. It is not a right to punish the company and leave the building of the road unprovided for. It is a right, and a right only, to adopt means to a particular and clearly specified end; namely, to complete an unfinished work. It follows then if the Government does not avail itself of this right—if it does not intervene while the work is uncompleted—does not enforce its reserved right to finish the work either by itself or by other agencies under its direction or by its authority, and suffers the company to go along after the law-day and complete the work, it has lost all benefit of this reservation of authority under section 9, and there is no default left upon which the penal language of the statute can operate.

I am abundantly justified, then, in repeating what I said at the outset, that so far as the Northern Pacific road is concerned there is no power now existing in Congress to declare a forfeiture of its land grant; and, this being so, am justified in replying as I did a moment since to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] that it was entirely proper for this company to do what it pleased with the proceeds of the sales of these lands. The lands were donated to the company so that the company would have assets upon which money could be raised to build the road, and now that we have the road—have the very thing we bargained for—it looks like child's play to be scolding because we made a bad bargain and somebody else made a good one.

But, Mr. Speaker, both parties, as I have pointed out, made a good bargain. On our part we have changed the colors of the northwest corner of our territorial map—have brought new States into the family, and have multiplied the fabulous millions of our national wealth many fold.

But, sir, there are humane considerations involved in this legislation that ought to condemn it in the eyes of all honest men. The bill at one blow confiscates all land granted to this company which happens to be located upon any section of the railroad which was not completed within the time specified in the act.

Many thousands of settlers are now living on these lands—have opened up farms, built homes, and set up their household gods in the honest belief that they have good titles to their possessions. You propose to turn these people off; to say to them it is true you have bought and paid for your homes in good faith; you have spent years of toil in developing your farms; you have taxed yourselves to build schoolhouses to give your children an education; you have built churches and court-houses, and have done everything and all things necessary and proper to be done to establish those houses and those communities of Christian homes that reflect more moral grandeur upon American civilization than all other agencies combined, nevertheless we are called upon to demand the forfeiture of all unearned grants of the public domain, and hence you must go. We are in the work of destroying the industries of the people, and it is but just that we supplement that work by destroying their homes.

O tempora! O mores!

The lands within reach of this confiscation are in area as large, or nearly so, as the six New England States. No confiscation in history compares with this either in vastness or in wickedness, or in inexcusableness. A part of the lands of Ireland has been confiscated four times, yet the sickening history of these confiscations has no chapters so revolting, so anarchical, so communistic as this. Cromwell boasted that he stole the lands in Ireland for the glory of God, but this steal does not have the poor justification even of a religious enthusiasm to excuse it.

I have thus far considered this bill as it is related to the Northern Pacific road, but it applies generally to all roads that have received land-grant aid. Many States West and South are affected by the provisions of the bill. I am not conversant with the language of the acts granting lands to these various roads, but gather from the debate that in some of them at least a clause expressly declaring a forfeiture of granted lands is incorporated in the act making the donation.

So far as those roads which have never been built, if any there be, are concerned there can be no objection to the proposed forfeiture; but in cases where the substantial end in view, namely, the building of a new outlet for the people, has been accomplished, there seems to be little propriety in persisting in the enforcement of a technical breach of a condition that has been acquiesced in for many years. And I suggest to the friends of this measure that they will encounter some legal obstacles in their raid that prudence would dictate as suitable matter for prayerful consideration. Merely declaring a forfeiture of a grant by legislative act does not make nor unmake title. Something more is requisite. The courts are open to the parties interested, and the justice as well as the legality of your action is subject to their review.

Now, as I remember the rule, time is never the essence of a contract unless it be so expressly stipulated. Courts are hostile to forfeitures, and courts of equity will always relieve against them by granting time for redemption or other equitable relief appropriate to the case. That these grants are contracts is too clear, at this late day, to be questioned, and that you are standing upon the ground that you can declare a forfeiture because time is the essence of your contract is equally clear.

The provision in these grants that the aided roads should be completed by a day certain or the lands should be forfeited merely presents the common case of a grant upon a condition subsequent, the breach of which by the rigorous rules of the common law, gives the right of forfeiture, but this right is always one which courts of equity will restrain and relieve against, unless the parties have stipulated that performance on the day named is the essential right bargained for.

The leading purpose of the grant was a public one; it was to open up to settlement territory then unreclaimed from nature. The Government, representing the people, made these donations to accomplish this public end. The great work of building a transcontinental railroad might or might not be accomplished in a given time. Vast sums of money, aside from that realized from the sale of public lands donated, were required. Money markets are fickle. Unexpected engineering difficulties are encountered. Hostile Indians dispute the advance of civilization, and a thousand other impediments delay the work.

All these things throw light upon the reason for and the expectations of both parties in framing the conditions of their contract, and add to this the controlling fact that the roads have been built, the great end of their construction accomplished, the long time that has elapsed since their completion, the long-continued waiver of your right to declare a forfeiture, and your acquiescence for many years in the mode of performance, not, it is true, according to the letter, but exactly, it is true, according to the spirit of your stipulations, it is easy to see that your standing in court will not be an enviable one to yourselves, and will be odious in the eyes of all fair-minded people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Ten minutes.

Mr. McRAE. I suggest that the time come out of the time allowed for the five-minute debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks that the general debate be extended ten minutes longer, as the Chair understands, the time to be given to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I ask that the general debate may be extended fifteen minutes. I am more interested in this question, probably, than any other man on the floor, and I have only got four minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the general debate be extended fifteen minutes, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] to have ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HARTMAN. Will that be taken from the time allowed in which to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CANNON of California. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The time of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] has expired.

Mr. LACEY. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. POWERS. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may now have five or ten minutes out of the five-minute debate in which to complete his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has just submitted that request.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No; this is only to anticipate the five-minute debate, when the gentleman can get the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] may have ten minutes now of the time set apart for the five-minute debate. Is there objection?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to amend that by asking that time for the five-minute debate be extended ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am content to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to modify his request by asking that the time for the five-minute debate be extended five minutes.

Mr. McRAE. I hope the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] may have the time he desires, but I will not consent to have the hour when the final vote is to be taken on this bill postponed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] objects.

Mr. McRAE. I do not object to granting time to the gentleman from Vermont. I want him to have the time. But I object to postponing the vote on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can only submit the request. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. McRAE. The request preferred by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has not been submitted, that the gentleman be allowed ten minutes out of the time to be allowed for the five-minute debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] be permitted to use ten minutes of the time set apart for debate under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. STOCKDALE. How much time is there for offering amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hour has been allowed for debate under the five-minute rule, when amendments may be offered.

Mr. STOCKDALE. The time is limited, then?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is limited to one hour under the special order.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Unless I am allowed to offer an amendment, which I regard as very important, and unless that understanding is had, I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can only submit the request, which is that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] be allowed to use ten minutes out of the time set apart for the five-minute debate. Is there objection?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the State which I have the honor to represent in part is probably more interested in any forfeiture bill that may pass Congress than any particular State in the United States; and it is regrettable, therefore, that I am limited in the observations that I wish to make to a mere five minutes. I wish to use those five minutes more in the way of inquiry as to the effect, if this bill should become law, on certain constituents and settlers of mine rather than in arguing any legal question, which has been so ably argued by the gentleman from Vermont and other gentlemen upon this floor.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my venerable and learned friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has referred to the Northern Pacific Railroad corporation, and seemed to infer that every man who lifts his voice here upon the facts is in some manner or in some way connected with that railroad, I want to say that I am in no manner or in no way, directly or indirectly, remotely or contingently, under any obligation to that company for my seat upon this floor.

I have had some experience with the public domain. I have some knowledge of that branch of the service. I have seen my country grow up when I had connection with the land office; and at all times and under all circumstances, whenever the opportunity was afforded me, I have been anxious to render service to the settlers who are developing the public domain. But the question arises in the city of Spokane, a city of 30,000, part of which is built upon an odd section of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company's land. They have parted with the title for a mere minor consideration, and the land is to-day worth, in all human probability, in round numbers, $10,000,000.

What is to become of this 320 acres if this bill passes? What title will the people get to the land on which they have their business property, their residences, and their hotels? What title can they get to the other 320 acres of land? How is it to be brought about?

The city of Tacoma is likewise situated. And all the way along the line, wherever cities or towns are built, they have been built largely through the instrumentality of the corporation on odd sections of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company's land. Who is to indemnify these people?

Now, again, it is a matter of fact that the railroad company, when they sold an odd section, they sold it upon a contract. That contract extended over a series of years, and was made on partial payments; some of it running three, some five, some nine years, at 6 per cent. How are the settlers who have paid that amount to be reimbursed for the partial payments they have already made upon those lands? That I would like to know. The railroad company is bankrupt. It can not pay a dollar. How are these people to be reimbursed for this expenditure of money that they have been making for the past ten years on these lands?

All the way along the line through my country that question is at stake. Gentlemen say Congress will do it. Why, Congress will do nothing of the kind. In the Fifty-first Congress we brought in a bill here and forfeited land in my State. I voted for that measure, because the railroad company had not built the line down the Columbia River, but you, and you, and you have charged, by the enactment of a law upon the statute books, the settlers in that 40 miles $2.50 an acre, because there was to have been a railroad built there. You have forfeited the land. You have not given the settlers any railroad, and have defeated bill after bill in this Congress to reimburse the settlers for the robbery you have made of their money.

That is the fact about it. We may as well be plain about the facts. Now, I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, and this is the truth, that until yesterday any man upon this floor with whom I conversed had ever read the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Men have introduced bills and made arguments in this House, and yet they have never taken occasion to examine the act of 1864. Now, if you take and read that act, I do not think there is a single acre of land forfeitable. I wish it was so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REED. This is not a question of sufficient importance to be debated. They do not allow it to be debated.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that my people are interested in this question probably more than any other, and I want to get some answer to these propositions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McRAE. I believe I have seventeen minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. McRAE. I only yielded twenty-three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana and twenty minutes to the other gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was out at the time. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman has only fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I want to briefly notice some of the points that have been urged against this bill. In regard to the protection to cities, towns, and villages, I will say that it was not thought necessary when the act of September 29, 1890, was passed to make any such exception, because it was supposed that no one within the limit of any city, town, or village owned exceeding 320 acres; and if not necessary then it is not now, because the title in the present claimants are confirmed by this act to that extent; but to remove any doubt upon that point, I have already prepared, and will at the proper time offer, an amendment excepting cities, towns, and villages from the forfeiture provided for by this act.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] made his argument under the erroneous assumption that the land grants to the State of Iowa are forfeited by this bill. Not an acre of land granted to that State is affected by this proposed legislation. The report upon the bill furnishes a list of the roads, giving the mileage and area of each by States, and it shows that there are no lands forfeited in the State of Iowa. There is no contention on the part of the committee that we could, if so disposed, forfeit the land of any road completed in time, and the roads in Iowa were, I think, all built within the time fixed by law. But to remove all question about that, I will move an amendment that will in express terms give such roads the full benefit of the extensions granted them by acts and resolutions after the passage of the granting acts.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN] has said that the rights of settlers are not protected by this bill. The gentleman either does not know the effect of the act of 1890 or he presumes very much upon the lack of ability in this House to understand a plain proposition. The second section of that act secures to all actual settlers six months from the date of its passage the preference right to enter under the homestead law, and if that right has been previously exhausted it is in express terms revived so as to save the home of every settler upon the land claiming under the homestead law, and credits him with the time of actual settlement.

The third section of that act deals with the purchasers from the railroad or its assignees who are in possession and protects them to not exceeding 320 acres by giving them the right to purchase at $1.25 per acre, and allows credit for what has been paid to the road when it is less than that sum, and if it is more than $1.25 per acre then nothing more is required to be paid.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. McRAE. I have only a moment, but will yield for a question?

Mr. LACEY. Does not the bill as offered by the committee cut off absolutely every one who has bought lands since 1888 and who has taken possession since 1890?

Mr. McRAE. It does not if he is an actual settler and will reside upon it. The third section of the bill would not apply to such cases, but if there are any such bona fide settlers in possession an amendment that would protect them can be adopted, and I will make no objection to it. The second section of the act which is made applicable to this bill operates from date, and this bill expressly provides that the time shall be computed from the date of this amendatory act. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has undertaken to make the House believe that if this bill is passed the railroad companies must be paid large sums of money for the transportation of mails, troops, etc. There is nothing in the grants to these companies that sustains that position, and there is no foundation for any such claims.

The grants to the railroads expressly stipulate that the mail shall be transported over the roads under the discretion of the Post-Office Department at such price as Congress may by law direct; and as a matter of fact the existing law on this subject as contained in section 4001 of the Revised Statutes was not passed I believe, until March 3, 1873, after all of the grants had been made, and after the most of the railroads were in default and subject to forfeiture. Congress has therefore reserved, and the roads have agreed that it may exercise, the right of regulating the compensation for such services rendered by them. So we see that the gentleman who has suggested that contractual relations would be disturbed certainly does not understand the law upon this point.

I think that the Department has uniformly held that companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on condition that the mails should be transported over the road at such prices as Congress should fix, must carry the mail along the whole line of constructed road, or at least to the line of the State to which the grant was made. In short, if the companies have accepted and used any part of the grant they can be required by Congress to carry the mails at such price as it may fix. Congress, in the exercise of its power, has required certain reductions and may extend them if it thinks proper. The roads, however, have been well paid for such transportation and there is no danger of any refund to them if this bill becomes a law.

It has been said that some of these lands are patented, and that by a measure of this kind we should not and can not disturb them. The weakness of that argument has been clearly shown by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], and all I desire to say in addition is that the grants themselves carry the title, and the patents are only the evidence of it. A patent based on a void or forfeited grant is of no value. The purchasers took with notice of the conditions expressed in the grants, and could purchase no title not granted to the railroads. If, however, we are to be influenced by such appeals, then we invite you to consider the claims of those settlers who, with patents in their possession, have been and are being ejected by the railroads or their assignees. Thousands of honest settlers, with the patents of the United States in their pockets or in their trunks, have been turned out of their homes because the patents were in conflict with prior grants. Gentlemen are very anxious to respect the patents of railroads, but manifest no concern for them when in conflict with the railroad title.

Mr. Speaker, I deny that this bill will cloud the title of the actual settler, or that it will disturb any of the rights of the bona fide purchasers who want the land for a home. It is a bill to save the homes of thousands of settlers along the lines of these roads who for five, ten, twenty, or twenty-five years have paid tribute to the railroad companies in the way of interest, rent, and high prices for lands that of right they should have had for nothing.

Mr. GEAR. The gentleman will allow me to say that the state of affairs to which he refers in Iowa was brought about by just the kind of legislation which he is now trying to enact—by conflicting acts of Congress.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman, I think, is mistaken. It was brought about by a grant to the Des Moines River Company. In the construction of that grant the courts held that the title passed with the grant, and that it was superior to subsequent patents to settlers, notwithstanding the fact that the settlers were invited by the Department to enter and settle upon the land. I have mentioned this to show that it is the grant and not the patent that controls the title. There are many such cases involved in these railroad grants unless they are forfeited and the settlers protected, as is now proposed. Some of the settlers along the lines of these railroads have for years been agreeing to pay enormous prices for lands they ought to have for nothing. They have been required to pay two, three, and four times the maximum Government price for the lands in rents, interest, and partial payments, and yet have no title.

After years of toil they must now surrender their homes, and turn over their improvements to some speculative assignee of the railroad companies and abandon possession. By this bill we say to that class of settlers, who are likely to become homeless, and to others who are already homeless, that they can retain their homes if they have them or acquire them if they have none, for a nominal price, and if what they have paid the company is equal to the minimum Government price for land they shall not be required to pay anything to the Government.

The gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber who have assumed to speak for the settlers have not presented any petitions from them, and I deny that they reflect the wishes of the settlers. I have petitions from settlers' leagues, and letters from settlers in many States, asking and begging Congress to pass this bill and save them from the greed of these corporations. It is in behalf of these people and in response to these petitions that I am asking the House to pass this bill, and the jeers and taunts of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] about demagogy will not deter me in the least.

Since the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman (21 Wallace, 44) was rendered, in October 1874, announcing the doctrine that there must be some legislative assertion of ownership of the lands for breach of the condition, from that day to this the defaulting railroad companies have by every parliamentary method known resisted such action, and they have been strong enough in this or the other Chamber to prevent such a forfeiture. It has been as is still their purpose to prevent a resumption of the forfeited estate.

The courts say that the legal title remains in the railroads until Congress acts; but they have not decided that Congress can not resume that title for a failure to build in time. The question now is, Will Congress do its duty? The gentlemen who insist that the courts will decide that Congress can not forfeit the lands opposite constructed road show a lack of confidence in their position when they vote against this bill. If they believe the law to be as they state it, they should not be afraid to permit this question to go into the courts; and they must know that it can never go to the courts until Congress acts. If they want it settled—if the railroad companies have confidence in their title and believe that it is good—then there should be no objection to the passage of this bill, and thus carry the matter to the courts to be finally determined. The settlers will abide by the decisions of the courts, whether for or against them; but they will not be satisfied until there is a forfeiture that will give them access to the courts.

Many of our best lawyers believe that if Congress makes an affirmative declaration of forfeiture, such as we propose now, that the courts will not nullify it. The people have a right to have the judgment of the courts upon this question and there can be no settlement of it until that is given them. The able argument made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], for whose ability as a lawyer I have great respect, would, if sound, defeat the forfeiture declared by the act of September 29, 1890, but no one has ever questioned the power and right of Congress to pass that law. It has been asserted by those who oppose this bill that the Government is bound by the ordinary doctrine of estoppel.

I deny that such is the law. No such rule is applicable to any sovereignty like the United States Government. Here is a decision of the Supreme Court in 93 United States Reports, page 486, on this subject to which my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLACK] now calls my attention.

In this case the court, speaking through Justice Swayne, quoted approvingly the following language:

> In a representative government, where the people do not and can not act in a body, where their power is delegated to others, and must of necessity be exercised by them, if exercised at all, the reason for applying these principles is equally cogent.

This doctrine is supported by an unbroken line of decisions and rests upon principles of sound public policy that should not be ignored. The individual has his own free volition at all times and can act any moment he feels inclined. But a Government like that of the United States, composed of different branches operating only at intervals under rules which make it difficult to act at all, and being subject to all the delays and forms and contentions of all stages of legislation, can not get out of what is often a condition of positive helplessness for long periods of time.

To illustrate the value of this principle it is only necessary to refer to the fact that in every Congress, with one exception, for twelve years past, bills similar to this have been passed by the House, but have failed of consideration or passage in some way by the Senate or in conference. If unable to protect themselves by being above laches, the United States are exposed to any big swindle that can manage to get a conditional grant or favor from the Government. From all that embarrassment the private individual is free, and it is right to hold him by estoppel, but not right to so hold a whole people, whose cumbrous and complicated machinery for legislative action renders them rich game for the rich and grasping corporations, with their intriguing officers and attorneys.

It is almost impossible to suggest an equity against a forfeiture in behalf of these delinquent railroad corporations. Some of the grants were made nearly forty years ago. Thirty years have elaped since the actual forfeiture of the grants occurred, and yet within the past few years portions of these roads have been constructed and, in some instances, completed, but scarcely any of the grants have been closed and finally adjusted. The neglect and failure of the land grant corporations to comply with the terms of their grants has been so open and notorious in my judgment, that as between the Government and them no injustice would be done if the entire grants were forfeited.

The bill leaves the rights of the purchasers and settlers as fixed and defined in the act of September 29, 1890, and will extend the same protection to purchasers and settlers on the lands forfeited by it if it should pass. It does not interfere with any special settlement provided for in that act. If then, sir, the companies did not comply with the conditions of their grants, if the title to the lands has not passed irrevocably to the companies, if Congress has the legal right to reclaim them for the people, I insist that it should do so.

No innocent settler on any of these lands, no innocent purchaser of any of them unless a speculator, is put in peril by this bill. It is a plain, naked question between the original parties to the transaction—the Government which made and the corporations which accepted the grants. No other person and no other interest is involved, and gentlemen must say by their votes whether they will stand by the people or the corporations.

The House of Representatives has for fifteen years been trying to do what we propose to do by this bill, and what I hope the Senate will promptly concur in. As my good friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has said, the Democratic party is committed as firmly as it can be to the forfeiture of these land grants, both by action in the House of Representatives in the past and by its platform pledges. The people expect us to redeem these promises. I hope that no Democrat who has regard for these party pledges, who has regard for the interest of the homeless people whose rights are involved, who has regard for the interest of those purchasers who have been oppressed by these railroad corporations and land syndicates, will hesitate for one moment to vote for this bill. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for general debate is exhausted. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, approved September 29, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 1. That there is hereby forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes the title thereto, all lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad opposite to and coterminous with the portion of any such railroad not constructed and completed within the time specified in the act making the grant for the construction and completion of the whole of such railroad for the aid or benefit of which such lands were granted; and all such lands are declared to be a part of the public domain: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as forfeiting the right of way or station grounds of any company heretofore granted.

Mr. MCRAE. I move to amend the section just read by inserting after the word "grant," in line 14, the words "or within the time specified in any subsequent acts or resolutions extending the time."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, this amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I want to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. STOCKDALE. It is at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to the floor if he desires to speak upon his amendment.

Mr. MCRAE. I will hear the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE].

Mr. STOCKDALE. I want to offer my amendment—not merely to have it read. There is but little time left, and I do not want to consume time unnecessarily.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman understands that I want to have the amendments of the committee disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas has offered the amendment just read, and is entitled to debate it if he so desires.

Mr. McRAE. I do not want to debate it; but I had an idea of moving the previous question on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can move the previous question.

Mr. McRAE. I will do so.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I propose the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1, after the word "provided," in line 19, the words "or lands included in any city, town, or village site."

Mr. WEADOCK. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment just adopted: "Nor as forfeiting lands granted to any State or corporation for the construction of any railway where such State or corporation had so far constructed said railway within the time specified in the granting act or acts as to earn all the lands available under such grant or grants."

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, this is presented to meet the following facts:

Under the conditions of the act of June 3, 1856, and the act of July 3, 1866, which acts make the grant, the time within which construction was to be completed was limited to June 3, 1873.

The road was constructed to Gaylord, in township 31 north. All of the available lands were earned and patents issued for the same on or before May 8, 1873.

The first patent issued bears date May 4, 1869, and the last one May 8, 1873.

These patents convey to the J. L. & S. Co. every acre of land embraced within the grant that was available for the purpose.

The road was completed to Gaylord in sections of 10 miles each, each section certified by the governor as being properly constructed, and patents issued for the same currently, all in exact conformity to the conditions of the grant.

Most of the lands have been sold to farmers who now occupy them. Farms have been cleared, children born and reared to maturity on these lands.

All lands remaining unsold have been mortgaged and the proceeds used in constructing the north end of the road through an absolute wilderness, where not an acre of the grant was available.

The sales to the farmers and the mortgage rest for their title upon the patents of the United States, which were given more than twenty-one years ago.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. McRAE. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. McRAE as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LACEY. I wish to offer an amendment to the second section of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has not yet been read, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill.

Mr. HARTMAN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk to be added to the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

After section 1 insert:

"Provided, That in all cases where any lands have been sold to bona fide purchasers for value, the title of such lands shall not be affected or impaired by the provisions of this act; but the titles to all such lands are hereby confirmed in the holders thereof, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. HARTMAN. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas, the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, will accept that amendment.

Mr. McRAE. I can not accept it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Why?

Mr. HARTMAN. Well, my purpose in offering the amendment is simply this: I do not know whether this bill is to pass or not. If it is to pass, I hope it will pass with that provision incorporated, which will operate to prevent throwing into endless litigation thousands of people who were purchasers in good faith of the lands from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, which runs through our State.

There are thousands of men all along the line of that road who have purchased lands from the company, who have placed upon them valuable improvements, expended years of labor in improving them, and spent a great deal of money. They have constructed irrigating ditches, which are expensive to construct; they have fenced them in, broken them, put buildings upon them, and in other ways have made for themselves, at a great expense of time and money, comfortable homes; and the result of the passage of this bill in its present form, and without that amendment, is simply to say that their title is unsettled; that the lands are to revert to the Government, and that they may homestead 320 acres of land or obtain title from the Government to that amount and no more.

I know from my own personal knowledge a large number of men who have purchased 640 acres of land, others 1,200 acres, from the railroad company, on which they have expended vast sums of money, and what will they do in the event of this enactment, or where are they to be reimbursed? Why, you say they have recourse to the Northern Pacific Railroad for the amount of money that they have paid in.

That is all very true, Mr. Speaker. They have recourse on the railroad; but as a matter of fact that road is in the hands of a receiver to-day, and is a bankrupt corporation. What sort of an inducement; what sort of an encouragement; what sort of a consolation is it to a man to say, "O, yes, you have the remedy, but when you get the judgment you can frame it and hang it up as an ornament on the walls of your house—if you have any left—for you never can collect it." That is certainly not what you desire. I know the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands does not want to do that. I believe he is fair; he has attempted to be fair in all of the legislation proposed here, or nearly all; but certainly in this he has made a great mistake.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, admitting for the sake of argument that the company was solvent and that you could collect from them, what does it mean? It means that the settlers must go into the courts; that they must employ lawyers and fight their cases. It is true that if I should speak for myself I would say let it go there, because I would get my share of the business in Montana and receive the fees; but is it right to charge on these men the responsibility of going into the courts to obtain the money that they have paid to the corporations for what they had reason to believe, from the action of the Government, the corporation had a right to sell, and which corporation is now insolvent? It seems to me to be a very important amendment, and I sincerely hope that if the bill is to pass at all it will pass with the amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to have the gentleman in charge of the bill give the reason, if he has any, why this amendment should not be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to forfeit 36,000,000 acres of land which is now held by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. One of the conditions of the grant was that the railroad should be built within twelve years from the time (July 2, 1864) when the law was enacted.

Section 8 of the act found in 13 Statutes at Large, page 365, reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein are so made and given to and accepted by said Northern Pacific Railroad Company upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: That the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than 50 miles per year after the second year, and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the whole road by July 4, A. D. 1876.

On July 1, 1868, Congress granted an extension of one year for the completion of the road.

The argument in this House was that these immense grants of land to the corporation were justified because the grantees, as a condition of the grant, bound themselves to penetrate unknown regions with no inhabitants but Indians, and that for years they would have no passenger business, no freight traffic or other sources of revenue, and that therefore this imperial grant should be donated to compensate for the immense expenditure incident to the construction of the road and the loss in its maintenance prior to the settlement of the country by white men.

Mr. Speaker, what did the railroad do? They waited until their grant had expired. They waited until our brave pioneers went into that country, braved the Indians, braved the wild beasts, cultivated the barren plains, made the country valuable, gave business to the railroad, and then, when all the purposes had ceased to exist which justified this Government donating them 40,000,000 acres of land, this great corporation, relying upon a Republican Congress and a Republican Administration, went on and built the road, or rather partly built the road, and now have the audacity to come in and ask Congress to confirm that grant.

Worse than that; the law specially excepted all lands containing minerals, and with their astute lawyers they went into the courts and obtained a decision limiting the exempted lands to those lands which were known to be mineral lands when the act was passed! Why, Mr. Speaker, on July 2, 1864, when the act was passed no living white man knew whether the lands were mineral or not; and yet under this decision they have taken possession of the property—mineral lands and all—and have obtained the benefit of the minerals for the last fifteen years, and now the Supreme Court has reversed that decision, and I hold in my hands the recent decision, saying that these lands belong to the Government of the United States and to the people.

Mr. HERMANN. The gentleman from Alabama has referred to the grant made by a Republican Administration. I would ask him if he thinks it any worse than for a Democratic Administration, within ninety days past, to patent millions of acres of land of the same class to these corporations?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No. Nothing is right that does a wrong to the people, and I do not believe that any Democratic Administration ever did anything like what is indicated by the question of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. What, you do not believe it? Why, you do not want to put yourself on record on that statement.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No, sir; I do not believe it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

I am glad to learn from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] what I had not known before, that the pioneers went out on the Western frontiers and "braved the Indians," and "fought with the wild beasts" of Ephesus and subdued the country, and then the railroads came.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is the truth.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The statement has always seemed to me to smack of demagogy as much so as any remark I have ever heard on the floor of the House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is a fact, no matter how the gentleman regards it. Everything is called demagogy on the Republican side of the House which seeks to defend the interests of the people. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody who knows anything about it knows that until the Northern Pacific Railroad was actually built there was no considerable number of settlers in all that region of country. I know something about what I am talking of——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And so do I.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor, and unless with his consent he can not be interrupted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The effervescence of the gentleman from Alabama does not alter the fact.

Everybody knows that but for the construction of these roads over that country there would have been no settlement to-day. I am not advocating the passage of the bill, nor am I trying to compass its defeat; but when an argument like that is made on the floor of Congress, I think it is time that someone should make a protest.

It was because of the building of those railroads, and everybody knows it, that the grand population of the best blood of this country went out across the plains and subdued that country and built houses and churches and schoolhouses, and made that country blossom like the rose. They did it because there were railroads there, and they did it because it was impossible to have done it under any other circumstances than that; and to say that they went there and made these improvements, and that then the railroads came out there, is certainly a misrepresentation of history.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Can I offer my amendment now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would not be in order now.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Then I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] is recognized.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the United States Government ought to be fairly honest.

This bill that is before the House admits that some of the people who have purchased from the railroads have good titles, and that they shall be preserved in those titles if they do not own too much land. In other words, if a man owns 320 acres of land he will be protected in his bona fide title. If he owns more, his title is to be forfeited. Now, if the bill was as proposed in the amendment that I wanted to offer, to send the question to the courts, to forfeit by a proceeding in the courts all lands that had not been properly earned by these roads under the granting acts and the acts amendatory thereof, I should much prefer it. I reported a bill of that sort when I was a member of the Public Lands Committee, and it passed the House and became a law, in reference to land grants in Oregon.

Let us reflect upon what we are about to do. We can not afford to do a bad thing to accomplish a good one. If people are the honest owners, bona fide purchasers of lands from some of these railroad companies and own them, and have improved them, Congress ought not to wipe out their titles, and then say to them go into the courts and reëstablish them.

To my mind that is not the proper thing to do, to say to a man who owns his land, and probably owns nothing else: "We will wipe out your title because we have the power, and then you can go into the courts and undo what the Congress of the United States has done."

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman suppose that Congress can by an act of Congress wipe out a title?

Mr. STOCKDALE. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] has said to-day that it can, and will, as I understood him. I think it can not. I think it ought not if it could, and send a poor man to the courts to defend his title because a cloud has been put upon it.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that he has misquoted me. I said nothing of the kind. I distinctly said—if the gentleman will allow me just a moment—that if any man held a title which was legal, if a company under the terms of its grant had the right to sell, that neither this bill nor any other bill that Congress could pass would reach the title.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, there are lands in this country that were patented to the railroad companies or to the States for work done and roads built after the time limited in the granting act had expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. LACEY. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is recognized.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I have been interrupted, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I desire to say that in some instances lands have been purchased in good faith for a valuable consideration by citizens, and the Government has issued patents to them. They have gone on and made valuable improvements upon them and put them in cultivation while holding these patents or titles under them. Such titles should not be forfeited without notice to the owners. It is contended that these people should have known that these lands were liable to forfeit and that was equal to notice.

But the Government went on and issued the patents; and Congress, of course, knew that was being done. It is also said that the object is to let the courts of the country try the validity of these titles. To that I have no objections, but think it would be fairer to require the Government to institute the suits and give the owner notice and a day in court to defend his title than to first forfeit it by legislative act, and require the owner to bring suit against the Government to reëstablish the title. The same object will be accomplished and hardship avoided.

The Congress passed such a law to forfeit the grants in the State of Oregon. I made the report for the committee, the bill originating in the Senate. I will vote for this bill, believing that it will be so amended in the Senate as to avoid the hardships I mention. I have always supported measures looking to the forfeiture of land grants not properly earned by the grantees or their assigns. But I believe it will injure any party to forfeit the title to people's farms who happen to have more than 320 acres without giving them a day in court and a chance to defend their title. Let us forfeit the lands that corporations improperly hold, but leave the farmers alone.

The amendment proposed by the committee to exempt people in cities and towns does not relieve the bill of these objections, but shows a discrimination in favor of people who are presumed to know more of land titles than the country people. The Democratic party has never indorsed the doctrine of taking lands from innocent purchasers for value without giving them compensation or even a chance to defend their titles to their homes.

Mr. LACEY. I move to strike out the last word, and I do it simply for the purpose of saying that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] is substantially the amendment which I announced on yesterday that I would offer, and which I discussed to the House. It is not the same in its exact verbiage, but it is substantially the same.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, the main line of the Northern Pacific Railway extends from east to west throughout the length of the State. For a portion of the distance along the line of that road we have lands that the people of that State are compelled to irrigate in order to make them productive. The people of that State have purchased those lands in large bodies. They have organized corporations for the purpose of purchasing these lands from the Northern Pacific Railway Company, and they have brought water upon those lands and irrigated them, and are now farming them.

Some of these organizations of men hold several thousands of acres each. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this amendment is not allowed to prevail, these lands in excess of 320 acres under this bill are to be taken from these men without any recourse whatever save against the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and I desire to state to the House that at this time the consolidated bonds of this Northern Pacific Railroad Company are quoted at 25 cents, and their stock is down to about 4 cents, and has been ranging from 4 to 7 cents for the last three or four months. Now, these lands are held by these corporations, some of them, for the purpose of being cultivated in bodies.

In other cases the corporations are holding these lands with the intention of putting water on them, so that as soon as they are in condition to be made productive they can be sold to the settlers of that country. Now, in some cases these bodies of land are very extensive. I stand here in favor of honesty, and the American people represented in this Congress can afford to be honest to these people who have purchased those lands in good faith, and there ought to be no question about the disposition of Representatives here to treat these men fairly.

Now, I am for the rights of the settlers upon the lien lands in my State. I lived for eight years in Eastern Washington, and I know the burdens that these people upon those lands have carried, and carried like heroes, and I am for the rights of those people and the settlement of these questions.

Besides this I am in favor of forfeiting the lands where the railroads have not been built, and where their contracts have not been carried out with the Government of this country and with the people of that State, and I shall always stand by those people and for their interests and for their rights; but I am not for the forfeiture of lands that have been fairly and honestly earned within the meaning and the spirit of the law that granted those lands. So far as these lands are concerned within the limits of my State and elsewhere within the American Union, where absolute good faith has not been shown on the part of the company, I am in favor of their forfeiture, and I believe that the people should have the right to go on those lands and make homes thereupon.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the arguments pro and con, legal and otherwise, upon this question, and I have read the reports; and as I have done so I have wondered whether this was a court of law, in which the other side advocated the interests of the railroads and this side the interests of the people. I have wondered how many advocates of the railroads find a place in this House. I have wondered if the arguments advanced are not distributed about, each one being given a point upon which he can elaborate.

Then again, the idea of charity is thrown in. The last gentleman who spoke [Mr. DOOLITTLE] said we must not disturb those people who have put their labor upon this land.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. DUNN. No; I can not yield. I say if a man goes on to the property of the United States, takes the risk of putting his capital there, he knows that property belongs, not to the State nor to the railroad company, but to the whole people of this country. And when a gentleman comes in and asks this House to become a charitable institution, to recoup him for his faults, his hardihood, or his want of intelligence, it is asking too much of this House. It is one of the special pleadings set up by the friends of railroad corporations. And I never saw the advocates of a fraud yet that did not have a pretense upon which to rest it.

Some say we are going to confiscate property. Do you believe that the courts of this country will permit this Congress to confiscate property? There is no sensible man who thinks it. The people who want this bill want to go before the courts for an adjudication. That is all. The representatives of this people at one time gave a grant to certain railroads, conditioned on those railroads accomplishing certain purposes designated. The railroads failed to do this, and the gentleman from New York, who is very learned in the law, would put us in the position—because they had not accomplished what they agreed to do, and because we desire to take back this grant—that we must go into a court of justice and get out a writ of ejectment.

That is about the gentleman's argument—that the Government of the United States had made a grant of lands to certain railroads for certain purposes, and that the purposes for which they were granted having not been completed, then, before we can get back what belongs to the people, we must go to the courts and get a writ of ejectment.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. BOATNER. It is that these same gentlemen who are now demanding the insertion of this amendment protecting all these titles passed an act in 1890 in which they made no such provision, and in which they were satisfied with protecting these titles to the extent of 320 acres.

Mr. DUNN. I am fully aware of that; and I can see that that is one of the subterfuges used as an argument to throw dust in the eyes of the people. I can see the specious argument advanced by those in interest along the line of that road, and I can see the arguments advanced by men who are not touched by that road in other States; and I can fairly place them as belonging to a class that sometimes used to be called the Black Horse Cavalry. They are always found about every legislative body. I do not suppose there is a man on this floor who can be charged with being the paid agent of any corporation. I do not think any gentleman can be charged with that, but I do say—

> The craven rook or pert jackdaw,
> Though neither bird of moral kind,
> Yet serve, if hanged and stuffed with straw,
> To show which way that blows the wind.

Mr. MALLORY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MALLORY. I want to inquire when general debate will close upon this measure?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. General debate was closed on this bill thirty minutes ago, and it is now being debated under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MALLORY. How long is it to be debated under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Until half past 4.

Mr. MALLORY. On this amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Until it is disposed of.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the legal arguments made on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. MAHON. I move to strike out the last two words. I will concede for the sake of the argument that the law as stated by the friends of the bill has been stated correctly. That as a matter of law the United States may have the right to repossess itself of these lands, but as a member of Congress I do not propose to vote for this measure simply because the United States may have the legal right to perpetrate a legal robbery upon innocent purchasers. I would apply the same principle to this case that I would apply between a private vendor and a private vendee.

Mr. Speaker, suppose I should sell you 500 acres of land and include in the deed a condition that within ten years you must lay it out in 10-acre lots and build a substantial fence around each lot, and that if any portion of the land were not laid off and fenced at the expiration of ten years that the title to the portion not laid out in lots and fenced should be forfeited. Now, sir, you proceed to do so, but at the end of the ten years there is a large part of the land that has not been laid off and fenced within the ten years; but after the expiration of the time, in pursuance of the condition in the deed, you lay it off in lots and fence it. You sell these lots to different parties. They pay their money for them. They go ahead and put valuable improvements upon the lots. They make them their domicile and they live there for years. I as the vendor stand by and see all this going on and wait until each man has put his last dollar into the property, not enforcing his right, or giving them notice of my claim, but instead, I stand by looking on, cognizant of the condition in the deed I made to you. I ask this House, in all common honesty and decency, would I be acting the part of an honest man after standing by and permitting these innocent people to improve the land to exercise my right under the condition in my deed to take the land from them?

I do not believe that you, Mr. Speaker, or any member of this House, would in your individual transactions perpetrate such an outrage and villainy on your neighbors. I say that under such conditions no honest man would take advantage of such a condition in a deed after he had permitted this thing to go on in that way. Now, sir, I am not willing to authorize the Government of the United States to do a thing that no decent and honest man of this country would do in his individual dealings with other people. On that ground, and on that ground alone, I propose to vote against the bill. If this bill is passed the Government of the United States will be authorized to perpetrate an outrage on these people, and it will be such an outrage that no decent, honest man in the United States would think of perpetrating.

I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS], that if I am in possession of a tract of land, although I do not have a shadow of a title to it, that under the laws of this country being in possession there is only one way I can be ousted. The claimant must have a better title than I have; he can not rely on weakness of my title. He is also bound to go into the courts and prove that he has a better title than I have. I have a right to make my defense to his demand. No legislative body has a right to legislate me out of possession and thus deprive me of my right to assert my rights in the courts. If the amendment of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] is defeated, I shall cast my vote against the bill.

Mr. BOATNER. I move to strike out the last word.

Reversing the illustration given by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, suppose, sir, that bona fide settlers upon the public lands have fenced 10 acres of land, have made substantial improvements, have built their houses, planted their orchards, established their homes, and ten, fifteen, or twenty years afterwards find that this has all been done on a railroad grant which they and officers of the Government had supposed had lapsed, and that the land belongs to the railroad instead of them.

Now, there are a great many more of that class than there are of the class to which the gentleman refers. It is astonishing, sir, that gentlemen upon that side, able lawyers as they are, will not perceive the force of the proposition that where the Government has authorized the sale of land under the circumstances which they state, this bill can not affect the title. Congress has no power to confiscate land. The law can not reach to any such extent.

The law will only reach to the extent of taking back for the Government property which has been sold by the railroad companies without lawful authority, and the people who have bought land from railroad companies, having no title to transfer simply occupy the position of all who may buy property from parties who have no title to it.

Mr. HARTMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly.

Mr. HARTMAN. Will the gentleman say to me whether he thinks it right where a company of men have organized, as they have in my county, and purchased 33,000 acres of land from a railroad company and spent $75,000 in the construction of an irrigation ditch and $250,000 for a malting plant for the purpose of raising barley—does he think it correct, right, honest, or just to deprive them of all the money that they have put in it as well as individual settlers that I have referred to in the past?

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, my experience is that people who invest that amount of money can get advice as to the title; and if they bought this property from the railroad company and the title is bad, they are not entitled to hold the property. They may be and are entitled in equity to be reimbursed for the value of their improvements. They would be reimbursed for the value of their improvements; but if the road had no right to sell them the land, there is no law or equity which would maintain their title. They bought with full knowledge, or opportunity to obtain it, of the title of their vendors; and if the vendors had no title to convey, then the purchasers obtained none and must suffer the consequences of their negligence or ignorance.

Mr. HARTMAN. But who will reimburse them?

Mr. BOATNER. Why, the United States, if the facts be as the gentleman states.

Mr. HARTMAN. But you make no such provision in this bill.

Mr. BOATNER. Probably so, but it would be an equitable claim, to which we must suppose Congress would give fair consideration. But let me call the attention of the gentleman to another class or case that does not seem to enlist the gentleman's sympathy.

A resolution has been for some time before the Committee on the Judiciary for consideration, introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS], in which it appears that a large number of his constituents who for years have been living upon property which they believed to be their own and which officers of the land office——

Mr. BOWERS of California. And for which they hold patents.

Mr. BOATNER. And for which, as the gentleman states, they hold patents, which now turns out to belong to a railroad company on account of one of those old grants supposed to have lapsed and reverted to the public domain. I ask if no sympathy is to be given to these men whose homes have been taken away and no compensation is to be given to them for improvements which they have put upon their land? They get sympathy enough, but, all the same, lose land and improvements, the result of years of labor, and do not have even the poor satisfaction of obtaining a judgment against their warrantor, who in this case would be the Government.

The railroads, by a strained construction of the law, a construction contrary to its plain letter, and contrary to the manifest intention of Congress, is permitted to evict them from their homes and compel them to pay rent for the lands they have brought into cultivation and the homes they themselves have built.

Now, sir, I lay it down as a general proposition of law which can not be refuted, that a man who buys land buys it on the faith of the public records; he can go and examine the title of his vendor; and if the vendor does not give him a good title, he has no title; and the United States can not be estopped by any such consideration as that from exercising its lawful right for the benefit of all the people.

Mr. BOWERS of California. This bill declares those patents null and void.

Mr. HARTMAN. What objection is there to my amendment?

Mr. BOATNER. The objection is just this: By the act of 1890, prepared by a Republican committee and passed by the Republican party through both Houses of Congress, and signed by a Republican President, you declared that a holding of 320 acres was all that ought to be protected. There was no protest——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARTMAN. That was Government land.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I move to amend by striking out the last two words.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated in my preliminary remarks, I regretted exceedingly that in the general debate time sufficient was not allowed in order that this question, involving the rights to a vast amount of property, might not be discussed in a calm and dispassionate manner.

The State that I have the honor in part to represent is more interested in whatever law is enacted upon this subject than any other State in the Union. I had no opportunity to examine this bill until it was called up, and then I propounded certain inquiries and interrogatories as to what would be the effect if the same should become law. Through the center of my State the Northern Pacific main line runs, they having in the grant in place the alternate sections of the strip of country 40 miles on each side of the track. It is not denied that the railroad was completed within the time specified under the law, and it is my judgment that when the time came when the railroad company was guilty of laches, then it was the duty of the Government to step in and build the road, as contemplated under the grant of lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

This the Government did not do, but permitted the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its associates and assigns, to continue along and build the road, and from time to time have issued patents to them for their granted lands. Only recently, in my home county in the State of Washington, the Commissioner of the General Land Office has issued patents to this corporation for a large quantity of land. What I have been more interested in since I have been in public life than anything else, and what I have desired most sincerely to accomplish, is the settlement of what is known as the lieu lands, or indemnity limits.

Under the act the Secretary of the Interior was empowered to withdraw a strip 10 miles wide opposite the granted limit for the purpose of indemnifying said company from any losses that might be obtained in the granted limit by reason of homestead or preemption settlement prior to the date of withdrawal of said lands. This withdrawal affected a large number of settlers and farmers, not only in the eastern but in the western portion of my State; especially is this so of Whitman, Columbia, and Chehalis Counties.

These people went onto the odd sections in the indemnity limits not knowing that the withdrawal of said land had taken place. They have built for themselves homes, and have been occupying the same. Many of them were upon the lands when I first entered the Territory of Washington, but it has been a long and continuous struggle in which I have been profoundly and deeply interested, and in which I have endeavored to find if there was not some means by and through which these settlers could obtain their homes.

I have always believed that where a bona fide settler initiated in good faith settlement prior to the selection of lands by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company he had the right to take such lands under the general land laws of the United States. In other words, that they were not entitled to make selections of lands, to indemnify themselves for losses within the granted limits, and from these lands already occupied by bona fide settlers. This I have repeatedly urged in season and out of season, not only in my own State, but before the General Land Office and before the Secretary of the Interior.

I have a personal acquaintance with many of these men. I knew them in the early days of the Territory. They are brave, honorable, manly, conscientious, and law-abiding citizens, and there is no sacrifice of a personal character that I would not be swift to make if I knew by any honorable means I could be of service to them, and any devotion of time or labor upon my part in order to secure to these settlers the title to their homes that I would not cheerfully do.

In my first remarks, Mr. Speaker, I spoke of the liability to confusion that would arise, if this bill was enacted into law, to those who had purchased larger quantities of land than 320 acres, and also to what must be the inevitable result to those odd sections upon which cities and towns are located. I stated, as an illustration, my own city of Spokane, which seems to me would be led into endless confusion, and necessarily so; and also the city of Tacoma, but I am now reminded that the city of Sprague and the city of North Yakima are also built upon odd sections. I am glad to say that as soon as I called attention to the danger of passing such a sweeping measure as the one now before us, the distinguished and able chairman of the Committee on Public Lands offered an amendment excepting from the forfeiture these odd sections upon which cities, towns, and villages have been built.

I am glad that much has been accomplished. I am glad to know that I have been able to save from endless confusion and an endless amount of litigation and strife over such a large and valuable property as these cities are built upon. I sincerely hope that the other amendment, which was offered by my friend from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN], and which seems to me to be entirely fair and just, may be adopted by the House. It only gives title to those people who have purchased a greater quantity of property than 320 acres, and there are many cases where lands of this character have been purchased in large quantities.

Take for illustration the great irrigation ditches in the Yakima Valley, which have acquired property in order to sell it in smaller quantities to the settlers, and who built the ditches to make the valley rich and prosperous and happy. Are they to lose all their land except 320 acres? Without water in that valley land would be valueless; with water it is rich and prosperous, rich as any other portion of the inhabitable globe. Men are busily engaged in building irrigation ditches and making these lands produce hops and fruits, prunes, alfalfa; but if they are to be stopped in this manner it would bring a blight upon the people of that section of the State that would cause them many years to recover from.

Take the case of land purchased in 1882 by a gentleman from Chicago, I think, in a portion of Whitman and Spokane Counties. I understand that he has sold these lands for so much wheat per year. If this be true, how are these people to obtain title to this property. Take again the case where people have been some years in making their payments. How are they to recover their money if the lands are to be taken away? Take the case I have stated of the city of Spokane, where it is partially located upon odd sections. What 320 acres are to be taken and what 320 acres are to be thrown open again? What an endless confusion and what a reign of litigation it would bring. What person or individual would be able to sell his property or engage in any enterprise if this thing is to throw a cloud over all property?

I know, Mr. Speaker, that whenever a member rises and attempts to bring out the actual facts of the conditions that surround the people of his section, and is doing the best he can to serve the settlers of his section honestly and without any demagogy, only looking to the best interests of the entire country in order that his people may become more prosperous and happy, that there is always some one like the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DUNN], who, belonging to that class who rush in where angels fear to tread, in general terms charges everybody who lifts his voice in behalf of the people he serves with being in some manner or in some way the tool or representative of some railroad company. They roll that epithet under their tongue as a sweet morsel.

Why, Mr. Speaker, in Constantinople dogs are granted certain privileges, and among others is the right to howl. In the House of Representatives every member is entitled to howl, and some of them, like the gentleman from New Jersey, vociferates "corporations," corporations," "corporations."

Again, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] states that the railroads were built after settlements were made. That shows how much a man may be mistaken who knows nothing about the question. [Laughter.]

The gentleman has stated that he did not believe any patents had been issued by the Democratic Administration. If he will take occasion to call upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office he will find how much he is mistaken in regard to this. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I went into the State of Washington prior to the building of this railroad, and I know something about the conditions that prevailed at that time. Our population was small and the country was sparsely settled.

I did not go there to subdue any wild beasts of Ephesus that have been spoken about here so eloquently. Oh, no! I went there with somewhat of the Shakesperian idea of "bettering my condition further than at home"—not with the Tennysonian idea that I would take unto myself some savage woman and rear my dusky race. [Laughter.] And since my first advent into that State I have never lost an opportunity to render the settlers some service that in some small degree might better their condition and make them happier and more prosperous. When I first got there the cry was "Give us a railroad!" The cry went up from Macedonia "Only give us railroads!"

My friend and colleague before me was living in the same town of Colfax, and he knows how we fought through long years to get a railroad for the benefit of the settlers in that State. He knows how much labor we have performed in order to secure transportation facilities for the product of what I earnestly believe is to be the greatest wheat field upon the globe. He has joined with me and I have joined with him in early and pioneer days in always endeavoring to secure every advantage to the settlers of that section, and whatever may come I know that he will and that I will always be found working in behalf of those earlier pioneers who swelled the mere pathway of pioneers into a magnificent highway and built on the other side of the Rocky Mountains an empire for you and for me.

I have made, Mr. Speaker, certain interrogatories of the chairman of the committee, as I have before stated, and he now proposes to offer the amendment which will be adopted. I am glad I have accomplished that much. I am glad I will be able to say to my people that I have saved them an endless amount of confusion and litigation.

I have been compelled to lift my voice in behalf of the settler. I knew that I would be exposed to criticism by those who can not lift themselves from their own environments, but I have honestly endeavored to protect our people who have established their homes in that country and made that sea of grasses turn into a magnificent granary, and when I have thus lifted my voice in behalf of my people, the gentleman from New Jersey (the only Northern State that in 1864 gave a majority against Abraham Lincoln) [laughter and applause] comes here and tells us that we are "railroad hirelings."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I wish I had an hour.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, when a bill of this kind was before the House in the Fifty-second Congress I offered an amendment similar to that now pending and supported it because I believed it to be in the main, after all the considerations bearing upon the subject were borne in mind, a just provision. I am inclined to think from what I see of the temper of the House on this subject to-day that this amendment will not pass. But in the brief time allotted to me I would like to call attention to the necessity at least (if an amendment of this character be not passed) of adopting some measure that will protect those persons who have purchased lands from the parties mentioned in the bill since September 29, 1890.

I have drawn up an amendment, Mr. Speaker, which I intended to introduce in the event the pending amendment had failed. It was my purpose to propose an amendment after the word "granted," in line 19 of section 1, page 2, by inserting the following words:

Provided, however, That all persons who have, since September 29, 1890, purchased in good faith from a State or corporation any lands hereby forfeited shall retain their title to said lands so purchased, free from any claim on the part of the United States.

I do not offer that proposition or suggestion as adequate justice in the premises, but simply for the purpose of undertaking to accomplish something that looks like justice to these people.

The House is aware that in 1890 Congress passed a bill—on the 29th of September of that year—which, whether it does by the strict rule of the law or not, nevertheless conveys the impression to the mind of the ordinary reader that it was the purpose and the intention of the act to confirm the possession of lands in individuals who had purchased them from the railroads that had completed the performance of their contracts with the Government by that date; that is to say, the 29th of September, 1890.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was an implication that it was the intent and purpose of the Government to confirm to the individuals who held lands their titles if they held them on or after the 29th day of September, 1890, under grants from the railroads that had been completed up to that date, and my proposition is simply to say to those who acted on the faith of the promises, or implied promises, of the Government contained in that act and purchased lands from the railroads thereafter, that while those who purchased before that date may have been put on their guard by reason of the action of Congress, nevertheless that act gave a just reason to believe, at least, that these lands were to be confirmed in them, and therefore we will, as far as we are able to do so, carry out in good faith that implied promise and confirm their titles.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] when he addressed the House on this bill.

As I understand the facts to be, various grants of land in the past have been made in aid of the construction of certain railways. Much has been said about the Northern Pacific Railway. Now, a time was fixed for the construction of these roads. Some of them were not constructed within the limits of the time fixed in the grant.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held in at least one, and as I recollect in several cases, for that matter, which have been referred to here, that the grants were made upon a condition-subsequent, and that until Congress forfeits the grants they remain in the railways; and that where the railway—as in the case cited in 21 Wallace Reports, in principle—is constructed after the time and before the forfeiture, that it does not lie in the mouth of the Government to claim a forfeiture of the lands so earned.

Now, that is justice, I apprehend, as well as law. When the Northern Pacific Railroad was constructed it was completed as far as Bismarck in the time fixed by law. The balance of the road has been constructed out of time, and constructed, too, before any forfeiture was declared; and in my judgment there is no justice or law in seeking to forfeit lands that have been earned.

But I was somewhat interested in the position taken by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. In the past he was chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands for some four years, in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses. What did we have then? The same effort to forfeit lands that had not been earned, and those also that had been earned. He insisted upon it.

Efforts were made to amend the bill to forfeit lands which had not been earned. But the House passed the bill under the lead of the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], and forfeited those which had been earned as well as those that had not been; and it failed to pass in the Senate because the Senate struck out the provision to forfeit the earned grants, and voted for the forfeiture only of those that had not been earned.

The gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Arkansas refused to take that which they could rightfully get, and thereby we had no legislation. What was the result? Why, the railroads went on, with no forfeiture declared, and built the roads and earned, say, 25,000,000 acres of lands, and the title became perfect. Why? Because the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Arkansas and such statesmen under the lead of the Democratic party would not forfeit that which they could forfeit unless they could also forfeit that which was not lawful for them to forfeit.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the whole matter; and if it was not that I know and believe—aye, more than that, I am satisfied the gentleman from Indiana is an honest man—I would say, if I was not acquainted with him, that such an action as I have referred to would point with almost unerring certainty that he was in the service of a constituency which was seeking to build the road themselves and to withhold a forfeiture of lands to allow the roads so to do.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend know that the Northern Pacific Railway was itself on this floor urging the passage of the act of 1890?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCRAE. I yield a half minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen will look at page 10435 of the RECORD of September 25, 1890, they will see a report by the distinguished gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED, made by him when he was chairman of the House Judiciary Committee in 1882.

Mr. REED exhausted all his great talents in this effort, but the infirmities of the case were so great that his illogical reasoning and unwarranted conclusions are apparent and striking, if not really startling.

It is only necessary to read this document to become convinced that the legal argument of the distinguished gentleman against the forfeiture of the Northern Pacific grant is utterly without foundation and that it is our duty to pass the pending bill.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I hope this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] will not be adopted. We have no reliable information as to the extent of the sales sought to be confirmed, but I imagine that many of these companies of which the gentleman speaks have been organized by those interested in the railroads.

The effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to confirm every speculative sale made by these companies at any time before the approval of this bill, and will inure to the enrichment and benefit of the men who accepted the grant and agreed to build the railroads within a specified time and failed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The directors and stockholders themselves?

Mr. MCRAE. Yes; they are as a general thing the directors and stockholders, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says. Mr. Speaker, we have sought to make this bill satisfactory to the settlers, and certainly the members of the Republican party who voted for the act of September 29, 1890, should not be heard to object to the protection given to settlers and purchasers. If the provisions made then were sufficient they are sufficient now. Four years have passed and I have not heard a solitary complaint from a single settler. They do not as a general rule own exceeding 320 acres of land. If the bill passes and it can be shown that the rights of honest settlers are affected, I know that Congress will protect them.

But let us not take this step in the dark; let us not confirm all sales without investigation or we nullify the forfeiture. We all want to protect the settler, and yet his interest may be antagonistic to that of the purchasers, and if so I am for the man who takes under the land laws. This bill protects the settlers, and as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] has said, we are not trying to protect those speculators who have undertaken to defy the Government, and who have litigated these settlers who claim under the public land laws in first one court and another until they have been bankrupted and pauperized.

We say that it is the highest duty of Congress in this hour of their distress to declare this forfeiture and enable the settlers to get a standing in court that will enable them to save their homes from the greed and avarice of the men who have organized land syndicates, and by speculative purchases have taken up all the rich land along the lines of these roads. I believe that if this amendment should pass it would confirm practically every acre of land desired by these syndicates, organized by the men who operate and own the railroad, and will give no protection to the honest settler who does not hold under them. We protect those who are in possession to the extent of 320 acres, regardless of whether the first sale was for the purpose of speculation or not, but we do not intend to confirm speculative holdings. The amendment is in the interest of the speculator and not the settlers, and I hope it will be defeated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired, and debate is exhausted. Under the special order, the hour of 4:30 o'clock having arrived, a vote will now be taken upon the bill and pending amendments. There is one committee amendment pending, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"SEC. 2. That all the rights, privileges, and preferences given, granted, or secured by the said act approved September 29, 1890, to settlers upon and purchasers of the lands forfeited thereby be, and the same are hereby, given, granted, and secured to all settlers upon and purchasers of any of the lands hereby forfeited and restored upon the same terms and conditions and for the same periods of time therein specified, computing from the date of this amendatory act."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, should not the vote upon the amendment to the first section come first?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This being a committee amendment, the Chair thinks it should be acted upon first.

Mr. LACEY. The difficulty about that is, the committee amendment would not be necessary if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; it would.

Mr. MCRAE. Oh, yes; it would be necessary, even if that amendment should be adopted.

Mr. LACEY. The two would be in conflict

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will first be taken on the committee amendment, and then on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 insert the following proviso:
"Provided, That in all cases where any lands have been sold to bona fide purchasers for value, the title to such lands shall not be affected or impaired by the provisions of this act; but the titles to such lands are hereby confirmed in the holders thereof, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HARTMAN, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARTMAN. Division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 92, noes 105.

Mr. HARTMAN. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as tellers Mr. HARTMAN and Mr. MCRAE.

Mr. POWERS of Vermont. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 113, answered "present" 2, not voting 139; as follows:

FORD'S THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. MANDERSON. I submit, from the Special Committee on the Ford's Theater Disaster, an amendment intended to be proposed by that committee to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I desire to state that this amendment will be accompanied by a report which will show the reasons for this partial disposition of the matter with which the special committee was charged.

There were eighteen persons instantly killed as the result of that falling building. Two died within a very short time, really within a few hours of the tragedy. Three have since died, surviving their injuries for periods ranging from four to eight months. A great many, nearly one hundred, were injured.

The committee have been as actively at work as it has been possible for them to perform labor during the last several months, and the proposition made by the committee now is as to all who were thus killed, either instantly or who died within a few hours after the disaster, to give to each one of their estates the sum of $5,000, making, as to the twenty who will be included in this amendment, the sum of $100,000. It is the desire of the committee that this appropriation shall be made upon the sundry civil appropriation bill so that the widows, the children, and those next of kin to those who have died may find what relief comes from this act of decent generosity on the part of the Government.

As to the three cases where the victims survived the accident several months, the committee will desire further time to make exploration, so as to be satisfied beyond a peradventure that the deaths were caused by this tragedy and not from other causes.

I will state that as to those who were injured a very considerable amount of testimony has already been taken, but I greatly fear that the matter can not be disposed of at the present session of Congress. I think the committee will probably find it necessary to take testimony during the recess of Congress, and we hope at the next session to dispose of all these cases.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator has answered the question I rose to put, as to what is being done with reference to those who were injured and not killed. While upon my feet I will state that a portion of the Committee on Appropriations are now considering the sundry civil appropriation bill, and it would be well perhaps for the Senator from Nebraska, representing the special committee, to present the matter to the subcommittee.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that and propose to do so. I have already had some conversation upon the matter with the members of the Committee on Appropriations in charge of the sundry civil appropriation bill upon that matter. I have taken time to make this statement so that the matter may be fully understood by those who are interested. I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF THE REVENUE BILL IN CONFERENCE.

Mr. HALE. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read and lie over under the rule, and be printed.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas on the 3d day of July, 1894, the bill H. R. 4864, an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, passed the Senate with sundry amendments; and

Whereas the Senate thereupon asked for a conference with the House of Representatives upon said bill and amendments, and the following Senators were appointed as managers of such conference on the part of the Senate, to wit: Senators VOORHEES, HARRIS, VEST, JONES of Arkansas, SHERMAN, ALLISON, and ALDRICH; and

Whereas on the 7th day of July, 1894, the conference so asked for by the Senate was agreed to by the House of Representatives, and the following members of the House of Representatives were appointed as managers on the part of the conference in that body, to wit, Representatives WILSON, MCMILLIN, TURNER, MONTGOMERY, REED, BURROWS, and PAYNE; and

Whereas the legitimate object of such action, on the part of the two Houses, was an immediate and full and free conference of all the managers of the Senate and House of Representatives together: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the chairman of the managers of said conference, on the part of the Senate, is hereby directed to inform the Senate whether a full and free conference is being held upon the bill aforesaid and amendments, and if so, at what time such conference was called together.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not ask for action at present on the resolution, but that it lie over under the rule, and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BLACKBURN rose.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the present consideration in the morning hour of the bill (H. R. 51) to change the boundaries of the judicial districts of the State of Florida.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would ask the Senator from Florida——

Mr. PLATT. What was the request of the Senator from Florida?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CALL. I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration in the morning hour of House bill No. 51.

Mr. PLATT. Allow me to say one word. The Senator from Florida gave notice in the early part of the week that he would call the bill up on Friday. I wrote to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS], who has been interested in opposing the bill, that that notice had been given. I wish the Senator would give notice that he will move to take up the bill to-morrow, because I think that is fair.

Mr. CALL. In deference to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, I give notice that I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the bill to-morrow morning in the morning hour.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. It is the intention of the Senator from Kentucky to move to proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill to-day. I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the consideration of the Army appropriation bill I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 195) to repeal an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral land," approved March 3, 1883, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 6557) providing for opening the Uncompahgre and Uintah Indian Reservations in Utah was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 562) for the relief of Marlin Parks; and

A bill (H. R. 1314) for the relief of Mathew S. Priest.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 11th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 411) for the relief of Samuel Collins; and

An act (S. 1759) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River, between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post-road."

MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6656) "To amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

WILLIAM M. STEWART,
WILLIAM B. BATE,
JOHN M. PALMER,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.
THOMAS A. E. WEADOCK,
F. C. TATE,
GEORGE B. SHAW,
Conferees on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6373) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In order that we may save time I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "For pay of enlisted men," on page 2, after line 8, to strike out:

For general service clerks and messengers, to the number and at the rate now fixed by law, $152,800, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to dismiss from the service any of the general service clerks and messengers when in his judgment their employment is not necessary, and section 3 of the act approved July 29, 1886, entitled "An act for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of general service clerks and general service messengers in the Army," is hereby repealed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This is simply a transfer. It will appear later in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 2, before the word "officers," to insert "such;" in line 4, before the word "officers," to insert "such," and in line 6, after the word "in," to insert "the Adjutant-General's, the Inspector-General's;" so as to make the clause read:

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $16,000; in all, $68,500: Provided, That there shall be no appointment of Assistant Adjutant-General with the rank of major until the number of such officers in that grade shall be reduced below four, and thereafter the number of such officers in that grade shall be fixed at four, and hereafter all appointments to fill vacancies in the lowest grade in the Adjutant General's, the Inspector-General's, the Quartermaster's, the subsistence, and the pay department, respectively, shall be made from the next lowest grade in the line of the Army.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order on the amendment reported by the committee. It is an amendment that embraces the appointment in the Adjutant-General's and Inspector-General's departments and changes the existing law. It confines the appointment of these two classes of officers exclusively to the Army. It provides that the appointments "respectively shall be made from the next lowest grade in the line of the Army." The existing law permits the President to appoint them either from civil life or from the Army.

Mr. BLACKBURN. May I ask the Senator from Texas what is his point of order? What is it he objects to?

Mr. MILLS. The amendment of the Senate committee inserts "the Adjutant-General's," and "the Inspector-General's," embracing those two classes, which are in italics. I take that to be the amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; that is the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. MILLS. That amendment changes the existing law. Clause 3 of Rule XVI says:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

This is general legislation. There can be no dispute about that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I take issue with my friend from Texas. That is not the law as it stands to-day. The President can not, and no President ever did appoint any man either to the Adjutant-General's corps or the Inspector-General's corps from civil life. He can not do it.

Mr. MILLS. Are you proposing to make no change of the existing law at all?

Mr. BLACKBURN. We are not.

Mr. MILLS. Then there is no necessity for this amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, there is.

Mr. MILLS. Why?

Mr. BLACKBURN. There has never been an instance in which the nomination has been made from civil life. As the bill came to us from the other House it declared that appointments in the Quartermaster, the Subsistence, and the Pay Departments shall be made from the next lowest grade in the line of the Army. All that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has proposed to do is to insert the Adjutant-General's and the Inspector-General's corps. If the President in making the nominations is to be confined to the line of the Army as to the Quartermaster, the Subsistence, and the Pay Department, to which the other House says he shall be confined, then the Senate committee simply proposes that as to the Adjutant-General's and the Inspector-General's corps the same rule shall apply. That is all.

Mr. MILLS. My friend is discussing the merits. I am talking on the point of order. We shall reach the merits directly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It makes no change in the existing law.

Mr. MILLS. But my friend will not contend, I suppose, that the President is now restricted in appointing these officers to "the next lowest grade in the line of the Army." He may be restricted to the Army, but he is not restricted to "the next lowest grade in the line of the Army," and so the provision I say changes the existing law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I see the point the Senator makes. The point he makes is not against the amendment reported by the Senate Committee, but against the bill as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. Mills. No; I am making that part of it against the amendment of the Senate committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is against the bill as it came from the House of Representatives that the Senator makes his point of order.

Mr. MILLS. But the committee take the provision as it came from the House of Representatives and insert "the Adjutant-General's, the Inspector-General's;" and therefore they propose when this bill is passed that appointments in the Adjutant-Generals and Inspector-General's departments shall be made from the next lowest grade in the line of the Army. That is unquestionably a change of existing law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not think so.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Inspector-General and the Adjutant-General can now be appointed by selection, but I am not clear about it.

Mr. MILLS. Are they all now required to be taken from the next lowest grade of the Army?

Mr. ALLISON. No; but the officers are to be taken from the Army. I think the chief may be appointed by selection. The provision, however, does not violate any rule of the Senate, even if we have modified it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no rule of the Senate against it.

Mr. MILLS. Here is the rule which I have just read:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no general legislation here.

Mr. PROCTOR. If the Senator from Texas will yield to me a moment, perhaps I can save him a little time.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am very sure that the present law allows, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says, the chiefs of all these corps to be appointed by selection.

Mr. ALLISON. From the Army; but the present law says that in the Adjutant-General's Department—and I think it is the same in the Inspector-General's Department——

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is the same.

Mr. ALLISON. That they shall be appointed from the captains of the Army.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of the line.

Mr. ALLISON. Of the line. It has been a subject of dispute in the War Department, and it is believed there that really the purpose and intention and the proper interpretation of the law would confine the appointments to captains in the line.

Mr. MILLS. That is not "the next lowest grade."

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly, it is the next lowest grade. So far as the Adjutant-General and Inspector-General are concerned the House proviso limits the appointments to the captains of "line" of the Army, instead of to the captains of the Army, as the law now provides. It merely makes certain what was doubtless the intention of the present law.

Mr. MILLS. I will cut this matter short by withdrawing my point of order, and by moving to strike out in the paragraph the word "and," the last word in line 4, and the remainder of that paragraph down to the word "Army," in line 9.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "four," in line 4, on page 3, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph, as follows:

And hereafter all appointments to fill vacancies in the lowest grade in the Adjutant-General's, the Inspector-General's, the Quartermaster's, the Subsistence, and the Pay Department, respectively, shall be made from the next lowest grade in the line of the Army.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the question will first be taken on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I take it nobody objects to the amendment submitted by the committee, and I ask that it may be acted upon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say that the law reads thus as to the Adjutant-General's corps:

SEC. 1129. All vacancies in the grade of major, in the Adjutant-General's Department, shall, when filled, be filled by selections from captains of the Army.

The same law applies to the Inspector-General. I know what the Senator from Texas wants to reach. There has never been any appointment or any nomination made either in the Adjutant-General's corps or the Subsistence corps or the Inspector-General's corps or the Quartermaster corps from civil life. There have been nominations and appointments made from civil life in the pay corps, and I am not objecting to what the Senator from Texas evidently wants to do.

The House of Representatives send this bill here declaring that the President should be restricted to the next lowest grade of officers in the line as to all these corps, except the Adjutant-General's and the Inspector-General's. The Senate Committee on Appropriations simply proposes to put those two corps in the same category. That is not in dispute. It simply means as to the pay corps, whether the President shall be permitted to make his nominations from civil life as to the paymasters in the Army. That is evidently what the Senator from Texas wants to reach, and I have no quarrel with him about it. I am entirely content to leave it; but, in order to get at it, the Senator must move to strike out, so as to put it into conference, what the House sent here, and he is not quarreling with the Senate committee at all.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator from Kentucky is right, and I will withdraw my amendment. Now, I will move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "quartermaster's," in line 7, the word "and," and after the word "subsistence," to strike out the words "and the pay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is what the Senator wants to do.

Mr. MILLS. So as to read:

And hereafter all appointments to fill vacancies in the lowest grade in the adjutant-general's, the inspector-general's, the quartermaster's, and the subsistence department, respectively, shall be made from the next lowest grade in the line of the Army.

From the days of the Continental Army down to the present time the citizens of the United States have had an equal opportunity with the officers of the Army to be appointed to the pay corps of the Army of the United States, and it is a fact that all the Presidents, so far as I have been able to examine the question, down to the present, have appointed more persons from civil life to the pay department of the Army than they have from the Army.

A few days ago it was proposed to disfranchise the Army in the appointment of cadets by confining the appointments to Congressional districts, where the Army and the officers of the Army have no opportunity to be represented. I then stood with a number of friends here and vindicated the right of the Army to be represented and to give to the President, as the head of the Government, the power to appoint ten general cadets at large, to be taken from the sons of officers of the Army and the Navy of the United States. My vote was controlled in that measure in order to do justice to these two great branches of the Federal Government.

Now, Mr. President, the Army are so anxious to have everything, that they have been pressing to confine every appointment within the lines of the Army and to disfranchise the whole sixty-eight or seventy million people, and to prevent them from having a single opportunity to have one of these officers appointed from civil life into the Army, and against the traditions and history of this country from before the time when the Government was born.

It is a singular fact, Mr. President, that one of the greatest military chieftains who has ever commanded the armies of the United States, second only to Washington in the estimation of the American people, Gen. Grant, I understand never appointed a single man in the pay corps from the Army—it is so reported to me—but appointed every one from civil life. A great majority of those officers have been appointed from civil life. There is really no reason why an officer of the Pay Department of the Government should come from the line of the Army. There is no Army knowledge necessary to enable one to pay the officers and soldiers of the Army.

A banker can do that as well as an educated military officer. He has nothing to do with military tactics; he has nothing to do with outpost duty; he knows nothing about provisioning an army or about mobilizing, moving, or fighting it. These are things that belong to the line officers, and, in my judgment, with the little military experience I have had, the line of the Army ought to be kept intact, and there ought to be no inducement held out to any line officer to go away from the line and into the staff, especially in the banking department of the Army. Those places ought to be open to civilians; at least, civilians ought to have an equal opportunity with the line of the Army to receive such appointments from the President of the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not mean to combat or resist the views held by the Senator from Texas. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the House of Representatives, as it passed the bill, stripped the President of the power to appoint to the Pay Corps of the Army from civil life. The Senate has nothing to do with that. The Senate Committee on Appropriations simply proposes by this amendment to put the Adjutant-General's and the Inspector-General's corps into the limitations which the bill as it came from the House prescribed for the other corps.

Let me inquire if the amendment of the committee, which has been agreed to, includes the insertion of the word "such" in line 2, on page 3, and in line 4?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to as a part of the amendment of the committee. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not believe in the wisdom of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas. If made at all, I do not see why it should not include both the Commissary's and the Quartermaster's Departments. There is no legal restriction now, and there has been none in practice, against appointing from civil life in those two departments, and there are now in both of those departments officers appointed from civil life, and they have been appointed within recent years.

I believe it to be for the best interests of the Army that the appointments in all these corps should be confined to the proper grade of the line of the Army. The opportunity for promotion in the Army is very poor at the best, but I hardly agree to the Senator's views that the Pay Department is an unimportant one. Some of the severest fighting of late years has been in attacks upon paymasters, and several soldiers have been wounded and killed in some of those engagements.

The course in European countries—and I think we must surely come to it here—is to do away with these special staff departments and have a supply corps. I hope the time may come when the commissary, quartermaster, and pay departments will be all in one and will form a supply department. I think the best minds in the Army look forward to that as a proper reorganization.

I think it is no more than right and just that those places should be saved for the line of the Army and that they should not be filled up with civilian appointments. These have not been, on the whole, the most fortunate. Without naming instances, that is very well understood.

Such appointments are made many times for favor, and no party is clean-handed in that matter; we have all shared in it.

There have been similar instances in the pay, quartermaster, and commissary departments, and if there is any point in the Senator's argument, it should include both those other departments. There should be no restriction upon either of them.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, if I had not known before that my friend from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] had been Secretary of War, his speech would have shown me that he had been in the closest kind of contact with the Army. The views which he expresses are army views, views which exist inside of a close corporation, and his views do not go outside of the Army and the army people. It is ordinary selfishness. It is not confined to the Army alone. We know that the Army are constantly pressing for everything they can get, and that every officer of the Army is constantly pressing to get every promotion he can.

It is just the same as it is in civil life with the rest of us; each is trying to find the highest point he can get. But we are here representing somebody else besides the Army. We have seventy million people who are interested, and I doubt very seriously whether this body has the right to limit the constitutional power and prerogatives of the President to give these appointments to whomsoever he pleases. He has the right to make the appointments from the Army or to select them from whatever station in life he may think proper.

But, Mr. President, the people of the United States have some right to have an open door into the Army. The Army is not alone to be consulted about this thing; there are other people interested in it. It has been the policy of this Government to make the Army popular. Of course, everybody in this country knows that a standing army is unpopular. The prejudice against it is one of the inherited prejudices which have come down to us from our fathers. It is no argument to say that because the quartermasters and commissaries are left out of this provision, this, too, should go by the board. Let them all come in if the Senator so desires.

The Senator says that some paymasters have been attacked on the plains. Whoever heard of a paymaster being killed? When a paymaster is attacked, it is the line that fights. They have to protect the paymaster, and the quartermaster, and the commissary, and all the rest of them. The paymaster is simply a banker who carries the Government funds under his charge to pay the troops. This office has been within the reach of the people of the United States for a hundred years, and the greatest men who have presided over this Government have shown that they have been in touch with the popular sentiment by appointing civilians as well as military men to these places.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have no objection personally to make, to leaving it possible for the President to appoint civilians to the Pay Department of the Army. It is quite possible to find some man of such experience and familiarity with paying men and with large pay rolls that he would make perhaps a better paymaster than would any person who might happen to receive an appointment from the line of the Army; but I do object to the invitation, so to speak, to appoint civilians in the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments.

Mr. MILLS. That is not my amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I know that. I have no objection to permitting the President to appoint civilians to the Pay Department, but as to the other departments I do speak for the great body of young officers, who have very slow promotion before them. It is considered an honor, a compliment, and reward to be appointed into the Quartermaster's, the Subsistence, the Adjutant-General's, or the Inspector-General's Department from the line. Those are military functions, and when a man of thirty or forty years has been many years out on the plains and amongst the hills, where he has been lonely and his surroundings have not been agreeable and there comes to be a chance for appointment as a major or a captain in the Subsistence Department, for instance, it must seem rather cold and cruel to hundreds of those gentlemen to have some personal or political friend jump into that very desirable place, which ought to be kept as a reward for gallant service. If the appointments were made from the Army it would give a chance for promotion all along the line down to the second lieutenants.

If you are going to have an Army at all, you must study the circumstances that will make it efficient and maintain its ambition and its zeal. Giving the opportunity to the officer to be promoted is a stimulus to him all the time in the faithful performance of his duty. If the President, when he has an appointment to make in the Quartermaster's Department, can range over several hundred young men of good education and character in the line of the Army, that stimulus would be constantly before them, and any one of them would be very proud indeed to get such an appointment. Now, I of course think it a great mistake as a matter of general policy to head off the possibilities of honorable promotion in the Army in that way.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think I know what the Senator from Texas wants to reach. If I am correct it is altogether commendable, and I am just as anxious to help in that direction as he is. I have no objection to his amendment.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be adopted, then.

Mr. BLACKBURN. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept it and let it go into conference.

Mr. MILLS. All right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It simply takes the pay corps out of the proposed law as the House has sent the bill to us, and leaves it where the law leaves it now.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, if the picture which the Senator from Texas has drawn of paymasters appointed because of their knowledge and skill of banking and money matters were the fact in practice, there would be something to his argument; but the fact is that such appointments when made from civil life have usually been made because of some personal favor or relationship or for political reasons, to the great injury, as I think, of the service. Now, there is an advantage even in the Pay Department in having a man appointed from the line of the Army. He is entirely in touch with the Army and is familiar with its customs, its laws, and its traditions. He is, in my opinion, very much the better officer because of his training and education.

I will only cite against the Senator from Texas the practice of the present Commander in Chief of the Army. He has recently made appointments to the Pay Corps, and has made them from the captains of the line of the Army. I am very glad to speak in the highest terms of his appointments in the Army, not only during the present, but during his former Administration. I believe they have, on the whole, been excellent. He has shown what he believes the law ought to be by conforming to the proposed amendment.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Texas, I understand, will practically leave the law as it is and has been for a number of years. The practice of the Executive, as cited by the Senator from Vermont, shows that it is not likely to be abused to the prejudice of the Army. If the amendment is adopted it will simply leave a larger field for selection and the opportunity of infusing new blood into the Army and bringing it more closely in touch with the people as a whole. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that it be stated. We have been unable on this side to hear any of the discussion.

Mr. MILLS. It simply permits the President to appoint from civil life to the Pay Department as has been done for a hundred years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "quartermasters," in line 3, page 5, insert the word "and," and after the word "subsistence" in the same line strike out the words "and the pay;" so as to read:

And hereafter all appointments to fill vacancies in the lowest grade in the Adjutant-General's, the Inspector-General's, the Quartermaster's and the Subsistence Departments, respectively, shall be made from the next lowest grade in the line of the Army.

Mr. MILLS. It leaves the law as it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 4, line 24, after the word "thereafter," to strike out "the Chief Signal Officer of the Army shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of colonel only, and the office of Chief Signal Officer of the Army shall be filled by selection;" and insert:

The Signal Corps shall consist of one colonel, who shall be the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and selected from the Corps, and one lieutenant-colonel, one major, and four captains (mounted), to be appointed from the Corps according to seniority, and three first lieutenants (mounted), to be appointed as now provided by law, who shall each receive the pay and allowances of like grades in the Army.

So as to make the clause read:

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $6,440; in all, $29,640: Provided, That whenever a vacancy in the grade of brigadier-general shall occur in the office of Chief Signal Officer, said vacancy shall not be filled, but said grade shall cease and determine, and thereafter the Signal Corps shall consist of one colonel, who shall be the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and selected from the Corps, and one lieutenant-colonel, one major, and four captains (mounted), to be appointed from the Corps according to seniority, and three first lieutenants (mounted), to be appointed as now provided by law, who shall each receive the pay and allowances of like grades in the Army.

Mr. BATE. On page 5, line 3, before the word "Signal," I move to insert "the commissioned force of."

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "Signal," in line 3, page 5, insert "the commissioned force of;" so as to read:

The commissioned force of the Signal Corps shall consist of one colonel, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BATE. I move to further amend the amendment by inserting at the end of line 9, page 5, after the word "Army":

The officers of the Signal Corps to retain their present commissions until regularly promoted in compliance with law.

The object I have in view in the amendment is just to let the officers remain as they are now. We do not want to deprive them of their commissions.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I object to that amendment. It puts every officer of the Signal Corps beyond the reach of courts-martial.

Mr. BATE. How?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If you are going to enact into law that the officers are to hold their commissions until regularly promoted, the power of a court-martial is defied, and not one of them could be dismissed from the service.

Mr. BATE. They have their commissions now. They are officers, and as such are amenable to any court-martial or to any other order, I think the Senator from Kentucky is entirely mistaken in that respect.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then what is the necessity for the amendment? They hold their commissions as officers in the Army now.

Mr. BATE. Yes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There can be no necessity for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee, unless it be to build up a muniment or fortification around these people which does not apply to anybody else.

Mr. BATE. Not at all. I think this change, so far as concerns the appointment of a lieutenant-colonel, and the promotion of the other officers, the captains and lieutenants, ought to take effect, and that is the substance of the amendment, from the date of the passage of the bill. I make that point directly, so that we may understand it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator offer that amendment?

Mr. BATE. I do, right now.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I wish to oppose it.

Mr. BATE. The Senator has opposed the amendment I have already offered, which I did not think went so far. I will read at length the amendment I propose. On page 5, at the end of line 9, I move to add:

The officers of the Signal Corps to retain their present commissions until regularly promoted in compliance with law, and for grades below that of colonel the reorganization herein provided for may be made upon the passage of this act.

That leaves it simply discretionary, of course, as to whether they shall make it now or not. The history of it, if I understand this subject——

Mr. PLATT. We can not hear anything that is said. Most of the discussion which has taken place upon the army bill has been entirely lost upon Senators on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have not been able to hear any of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair requests Senators and gentlemen who have the privileges of the floor to refrain from conversation. Business will be suspended until order is restored. The Chair desires to state that there is complaint from Senators that they are absolutely unable to hear what is taking place in the Chamber.

It is a disagreeable duty to constantly call the attention of Senators and gentlemen who are upon the floor to this fact; but there is absolute necessity for it. The Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. MANDERSON I ask the Senator from Tennessee to permit the amendment that was agreed to, as I understand, by the Senator from Kentucky, in charge of the bill, and also the additional amendment, to come in at the end of the paragraph, to be read at the desk, so that we may understand them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is right.

Mr. BATE. I will state that the first amendment was the insertion, before the words "Signal Corps," in line 3, on page 5, of the words "commissioned force of the." That is the only amendment which has yet been made. I send to the desk the amendment which I now propose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, at the end of line 9, add:

The officers of the Signal Corps to retain their present commissions until regularly promoted in compliance with law; and for grades below that of colonel the reorganization herein provided for may be made upon the passage of this act.

Mr. BATE. It is simply a question as to what time the organization shall take effect.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Tennessee, but I mean to make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. BATE. If the Senator from Kentucky does that, I shall fall back on my original amendment, which was referred to the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was not reported.

Mr. BATE. Not only that, but I shall produce the record showing that it came from the Committee on Military Affairs with the approval of every member except one, who was not present. That makes it in order, I presume. I hope the Senator will not make the point of order, because I wish to have the proposition determined on the merits.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I shall not make the point of order now.

Mr. BATE. I do not want any technicalities. If I am wrong I want the Senate to say so.

Mr. President, this is simply a question as to when the reorganization shall take effect. The tendency of it is not to remodel altogether the Signal Corps as it now exists. The Signal Corps has been a progressive, scientific corps. It is one of the eight or ten corps in the Army. At present it has a brigadier-general at its head, Gen. Greely. There is a hiatus to-day between the brigadier-general and a major. There is no colonel; there is no lieutenant-colonel. There is a gap to be filled up; there is a want of symmetry in it, and it spoils the whole organization. It is the only corps of all the corps in the Army which is in that position.

My amendment, to which the committee have agreed so far as concerns the appointing of a lieutenant-colonel—and, by the by, the proposition comes from Gen. Greely himself, who is at the head of the organization and is a brigadier-general—proposes that when his time expires, or when the office becomes vacant, there shall be no more brigadiers-general at the head of it, but that a colonel shall be in charge of it, and that by selection. That is the committee's amendment now (it was instigated by the chief of this corps, if I am informed correctly), and it has been agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BATE. His report, produced in the other House, shows it. Gen. Greely, I understand, has about ten or twelve years yet to serve before he could be retired on account of age. It is purely, then, discretionary with him as to whether he shall retire now or whether he shall do so under a surgeon's certificate, with the consent of the President. Here, then, would be a delay of ten or twelve years, during which doubt would exist as to what the real organization is to be.

I say it will have a demoralizing effect upon the corps. I agree with the committee that this gap should be closed by proper appointment. I do not complain that the chief shall be reduced to colonel, and that the appointment may be made by promotion from the corps. That is proper, and it is the amendment.

Now, if you have your lieutenant-colonel there and your major, and your captains, and your lieutenants, you would have it complete. The Signal Corps is one of the most useful and indispensable corps that belong to the Army. It is true, sir, it is of recent growth. It sprung up with Dr. Myer, I understand, during the late war between the States, and was utilized most effectively, the proof of which is on record by Gen. Sherman, by Gen. Thomas, by Gen. McClellan, and by others, showing that it was indispensable.

After the close of the war it was recommended that it should be organized into a separate corps, and it was so organized. It has varied in its fortunes from that time on. Generally it has been treated as a football here whenever the appropriation bills come in, and has found its existence almost entirely based upon provisions in appropriation bills, until October 1, 1890, when a bill was passed giving the Signal Corps a separate and distinctive existence, and separating it from the Weather Bureau. Now it is a part of the Army, known as the Signal Corps. The utility of it is not denied.

It is scientific and progressive. It began with the signal flag in the war. It now has its flags, its heliographs, its search-light, its telephone trains, its captive balloons, and its dirigible or steering balloons. All this is going on in a scientific way. These appliances are of great advantage in military matters, and are important to the organization and movements of armies and to give information during battles, upon which might depend the fate of nations.

Our system here has been adopted in Europe—England, France, Belgium, Austria, Russia—all have adopted the system that has been in use here, and preserve, I believe, to some extent, our hieroglyphical alphabet with its signs and symbols. In Russia they have parks for signal-corps trains, with every necessary equipment, where select men become expert by drill. It is a growing arm of the military in every civilized country. Sir, if it had existed in other days there would not have been such trouble in the management of troops during battle.

Wellington himself, upon the field of Waterloo, when the trouble culminated between all Europe and France, never would have uttered with a sigh those historic words—would that Blucher or night would come—if he had had the advantage of a signal corps. It has become indispensable in all well organized armies. It has come to stay, and will stay with us. It is scientific and progressive, and we must sustain and encourage it. That being so, the question is how shall we organize it so as to make it the most effective.

Look at it practically and see the working of this new addition to armies. It is effective in peace as well as war. See the troubles in Chicago the other day. I have here a dispatch this morning from Lieut. Allen, of the Signal Corps, who is detailed there as part of the staff of the general in command, Gen. Miles. It shows its practical utility in troubles of that kind by giving communication when wires are cut and it can be given in no other way——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. We can not hear on this side of the Chamber what is said. What fault does the Senator find with the details of the amendment as submitted by the Committee on Appropriations? What is the fault with the amendment?

Mr. BATE. Because it puts it off, say, twelve years before it goes into effect.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I shall answer the Senator from Tennessee in a few minutes.

Mr. HALE. Everybody recognizes the merits of the corps as eloquently presented by the Senator from Tennessee. The only question is as to details. We have not been able to hear on this side what it is the Senator proposes.

Mr. BATE. The substance of my amendment is that it shall go into effect now. If it is a good organization the symmetry should be preserved, and we should appoint these officers and let it take effect to-day; that is to say, the lieutenant-colonel should be appointed, and let the lieutenant-colonel be held in abeyance until Gen. Greely retires, or until a vacancy occurs, and then it can go into full effect.

I fear to put it off will withdraw the incentive to good conduct and official improvement upon the part of the younger men of this corps, as it would in any other corps. One of the incentives that soldiers and officers have to do their duty is to win honors and be promoted. This to some extent will withdraw that incentive. There is no opportunity for promotion in this proposed law. Therefore, Mr. President, it should take effect now so as to have this inducement given the officers, and let it go on smoothly and successfully. Do not let us degrade this corps. It costs less than any other corps. I have the proof here to show it. Every other corps, as I have said, has a brigadier-general at its head but this one.

Now, you propose to give this colonelcy, but do not let us have a gap with the lieutenant-colonel wanting. The committee have agreed to that, and the simple question, as I understand it, is narrowed down to the point as to when it shall take effect. Am I not right?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No.

Mr. BATE. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to take issue with my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. BATE. I am not quite through, but I will let the Senator from Kentucky go on.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to take issue with the Senator from Tennessee upon each and every proposition he has stated, for I do not think that one of them is sound. He tells us about the value of this corps. I do not agree to that. We saw its present head (and I am his personal friend, and was glad to see it) given the distinction that was awarded him when he was jumped from a captain's place to a brigadier-general's place.

I was very glad to see that jump made, not because I thought it was fair, but because I like the man. I do not know many more valueless, worthless luxuries the Government is indulging in to-day than the very corps over whose exploits, never yet achieved, the Senator from Tennessee waxes so eloquent. But more than that, the Senator offers an amendment and asks the Senate to adopt it, which puts every commissioned officer in that corps beyond the reach of a court-martial, and says that they shall hold their commissions despite court-martials, despite military discipline, despite law, and that they shall not be interfered with in those commissions until they are regularly promoted. That is one objection.

There is another and a still graver objection. The Senator tells us about the lack of symmetry in this corps. I admit it, but his amendment does not tend to help it any. Here is a brigadier-general. No colonel is to be provided for until that brigadier-general shall die, or resign, or be retired. But the Senator from Tennessee wants a lieutenant-colonel. I should like to know how that would help to round out the symmetry. There would be just as much of a gap as there is to-day.

Mr. President, the truth is just this. There is an officer in that corps to-day holding the rank of major, who wants to be a lieutenant-colonel, and he objects to the word "thereafter," the first word in line 24 on page 4. I challenge the record of the War Department, I challenge the Senator from Tennessee, to find me a single man whose name is borne upon the roster of the Army, who has been promoted as fast as the major who wants to fill this gap and round out and perfect the symmetry of the Signal Corps by being made a lieutenant-colonel.

He went from a lieutenancy to a captaincy, if my memory serves me, in about three years, instead of waiting twenty years, as most lieutenants have to do. I think it was about three years that bridged him from a lieutenancy to a captaincy. It was one year that bridged him from a captaincy to majority; and two years have not yet expired when he stands here demanding that the symmetry of the Signal Corps shall be rounded out by making him a lieutenant-colonel.

I challenge the record of the War Office for another purpose, and that is to furnish a sentence, a word, or a syllable in that officer's record that entitles him to such consideration or to any promotion at all, whether in peace or in war. If he ever smelled burning gunpowder none of us ever heard of it. If he ever rendered such conspicuous specific service or scientific service, or any other sort of service, I will withdraw all objection and agree that the Senator's amendment shall go through.

But I insist that the amendment is faulty in two respects. In the first place, it puts this corps beyond the reach of military discipline or regulation or law; secondly, it proposes a reorganization that will have but one effect, and that is to promote from a majority to a lieutenant-colonelcy a man who has already been promoted faster and for less service than any other man whose name burdens the pay roll of the Federal Army.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, if there is any one criticism that can be made with force upon the Army legislation of the last fifteen or twenty years it is that it has been in the direction of making the Army of the United States top-heavy. We have been legislating, and legislating I think at times under pressure, in the direction of the increase of the staff corps of the Army to the detriment and material damage to the line of the Army. It is not to be wondered at that we have done this thing.

The experts of the different staff corps are of course anxious for that which is dear to every soldier who loves his profession—promotion to higher rank. They like to enlarge and amplify the duties which are incumbent upon the different departments to which they belong. It is natural, and I do not find fault with them, that they use every effort and all their energy to produce the result which they desire. It has been hard to make head against these efforts in the past. The Congress of the United States has in numerous bills and sometimes by legislation upon appropriation bills met their views, as I think to the damage of the Army.

Mr. President, I really think it is about time to call a halt in that direction. I should like to see reform begin at the other end. I sympathize with the recruiting officer who during the war, when recruiting grew rather slow, proposed to raise a regiment of brigadiers. Of course everyone would be very anxious to join an organization of that character. I think the time has come when there should be enlargement and increase of the line of the Army of the United States.

Everyone who has personal acquaintance with the line of the Army knows, in the different corps of the cavalry, of the artillery, and the infantry, gray-headed men who have grown old in service, and in distinguished, arduous, difficult, and dangerous service, who have not yet reached the rank of captain. There is not the incentive there should be that the enlisted men of the Army, many of whom are well entitled to commissions, who could pass the examination required by law and who are fitted to be second lieutenants in the Army and fitted to go to higher grades by regular promotion and by proper examination—I say there is not the incentive to these men that there ought to be; but that, of course, is all apart from the proposition now under discussion.

I think that so far as the staff department of the Army is concerned, when we come to a time when the Army of the United States shall be used in actual war, instead of enlarging our staff corps we will decrease them by consolidation. We could well do that in time of peace; but unfortunately, although in peace we should prepare for war, we never do prepare for war until the emergency is upon us. I shall not go into detail as to what might be consolidated; but there is no man who has studied the question of the Army, there is no man who has had an experience in it either in time of war or in time of peace, who does not realize that many of these corps could properly be joined.

For instance, there is no reason why there should be a commissary's and a quartermaster's department entirely distinct the one from the other. There is no reason why there should not be a department of supply. It puzzles a man who has had army experience to tell as to whether a certain implement or piece of war material or matter of supply is to go to a quartermaster, a commissary, or an ordnance officer, and I think we might well have a department of supply that would consolidate some of these corps.

Mr. HALE. It is so in the Navy.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, it is so in the Navy of the United States and works without difficulty there, and there is no reason why it should not be so in the Army. I see no reason why the Signal Corps of the Army should be a thing apart from all the other staff departments of the Army. It could be well joined to one of them. But upon that of course we can not legislate in this bill.

Now, the proposition is by this proposed enactment that when in the case of the present brigadier-general, who is the head of the Signal Corps, there shall be a vacancy, whether that vacancy shall occur by death, by retirement, from length of service, retirement from disability, or retirement from age, then there shall be what my colleague upon the Committee on Military Affairs and its efficient chairman says is a symmetrical organization of the Signal Corps. I agree with him that if we are to have the Signal Corps as a separate department from all others, it should be of symmetrical form, the department to have a colonel at its head, and the intermediate grades of lieutenant-colonel, major, captain, and lieutenant should follow.

But I do not agree with my colleague on the committee in the belief that that necessity is now upon us; that we should at once make the change that will cause Maj. Dunwoody to be made a lieutenant-colonel; that shall cause Capt. Craig to be made a captain, and promote the lieutenants to be captains of the corps. As has been suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], promotion in the Signal Corps has been extremely rapid. Its composition is as follows:

The Chief Signal Officer, with the rank of brigadier-general, is Gen. Greely, who would probably retire from age ten or twelve years hence, who undoubtedly could at any time retire on account of disability incurred in the line of his duty in the performance of a great work with which we are all familiar, and for which the country is glad to give him credit, and has given him deserved and most distinguished honor.

Following him in the present list is Maj. Henry H. C. Dunwoody. Maj. Dunwoody entered the Army in 1862. He was made second lieutenant of the artillery in June, 1866; first lieutenant in February, 1867; captain, June, 1889; major of Signal Corps in 1890, and accepted that place in 1891.

Capt. Craig entered the Army in 1866; was made captain and quartermaster in 1888; was made captain in Signal Corps in 1890, and accepted it in 1891.

Capt. Allen was made second lieutenant in 1872; first lieutenant in 1879; captain in 1888; captain in Signal Corps in 1890, and accepted in 1891.

Capt. Thompson entered the Army in 1868; made first lieutenant in 1880; captain in 1890; accepted in 1891.

Capt. Scriven entered the Army in 1878; first lieutenant in 1885; first lieutenant Signal Corps in 1890; made captain in 1892.

Capt. Glassford was made first lieutenant in 1890, and captain in 1893.

I will not pass to the lieutenants of the corps. I have read this simply to show that the promotion of the officers of the Signal Corps has been exceptionally rapid. They have gone through these higher grades, passing those who were with them at the Military Academy, and leaving them largely to-day in the rank of first lieutenant of the Army.

Mr. President, I do not think we need to strain any point here to give immediate promotion to these gentlemen. I think with their corps thus made symmetrical, thus licked into the shape they desire, they can well afford to wait until there shall be a vacancy created either by the resignation, the retirement from disability, from length of service, or from age, of the distinguished gentleman who is now at the head of the corps.

I do not find myself differing very often with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, but I think in this case it is well enough for us to make haste slowly. The Signal Corps is certainly not now so important an adjunct of the Army that it can not afford to abide its time for the rapid promotion that is bound to come in the immediate future to those who are upon the roll.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I do not differ very widely with my colleague on the committee who has just taken his seat, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. The only difference between us is as to when this shall take effect. We agree, and the committee seem to agree pretty well, too, upon a partial symmetry of the Signal Corps; that is to say, that there shall be a lieutenant-colonel appointed, and that the colonel shall be appointed when the vacancy occurs, as indicated, by the resignation or removal in any way of Gen. Greely, who now holds the chief place in it.

But I think that it is proper if we are going to organize the corps after the fashion indicated by the committee that it should be done at once for the reasons which I have heretofore mentioned, and which I shall not reiterate.

I desire to say, however, in reply to some remarks which have been made in regard to this matter that Gen. Greely was appointed because of scientific services he had rendered the country; so it seems he did go from the rank of a captain to that of a brigadier-general.

That matter is a subject of criticism, but it meets, however, the approval of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

It is the officer whose good fortune it has been to be promoted to a majority who is jumped upon with both feet by my friend from Kentucky. He does not want to see him promoted further now, alleging that it is very rapid, and also an allusion to that fact was made by the Senator from Nebraska. He, however, read from the Army Register, which shows that this man, who is now the major in this corps, Maj. Dunwoody, received a military education and entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1862, and after four years he was a graduate, and with honor.

That is some thirty years ago. If you call getting to a majority within thirty years rapid promotion, then of course there has been rapidity of promotion in this case. But I insist that thirty years is a long period for a man who has received a military education to go from a lieutenancy up to a majority.

Therefore, there is no indecent haste in this matter, as has been intimated; and there is no excessive desire upon the part of the gentleman who holds this majority or upon the part of his friends to see him promoted, except upon the grounds of merit. Why did he get this majority? For scientific reasons in part, just as Greely was appointed brigadier-general.

Furthermore, I desire to say to the Senate and to you, Mr. President, that he won this majority, which is very rarely the case, upon competitive examination. Under the law of October, 1890, he was put to the test along with his fellows in the reorganization of the corps, and he won it fairly. He is one of the few men entitled to the straps of a major who has won his rank by a competitive examination, thus showing his superiority of the class with which he was thrown in reference to that promotion; and allow me to say there is no no class or set of officers in the Army superior to them. That is why it was done and not with indecent haste, nor by potential influence with the appointing power, but it became his by right under the law.

Maj. Dunwoody was many years a lieutenant, a short time a captain, and it was his fortune to have been detailed into a particular service, the Weather Bureau service. I might stop to read a letter addressed by the Secretary of Agriculture, who has charge of this Department, to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], in regard to the capacity, fitness, and efficiency of Maj. Dunwoody for the scientific work in which he is engaged; but it might be disagreeable to him for me to do so, and therefore I decline so doing. I will say, however, it shows an efficiency that is rarely, if ever, equaled.

I repeat, he won this upon merit by a competitive examination, and upon the grounds of merit alone, and it took him thirty years to pass through the regular channels from a lieutenancy to a majority. If the Senator thinks that is rapid promotion he is welcome to do so.

Now, sir, Maj. Dunwoody belongs to this corps and he won the position, and if promotion is to take place I am for him having it. He has distinguished himself most worthily.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky speaks of luxurious life in Washington. He can not lay that charge at this man's door.

Permit me to say, sir, that he is a man who is up at night in the performance of his duty without increase of pay, when you and I and all here are asleep. He is temporarily detailed to the Weather Bureau at this place—the head of that Bureau. It may be said to be a life study with him. As young as you say he is, he has grown gray in that scientific service, and is conceded to be the greatest success in his line ever known in this country or even in Europe. This is conceded, and publicly so by scientific journals on both continents. This is the man, Mr. President, whose promotion is objected to when he would win it fairly, because he holds the majority now won by competition, and under this amendment there would be an opening. It is not by selection, but under the true rule that he should be promoted in the corps to which he belongs.

Mr. President, I was pleased with the remarks of my colleague on the Military Committee, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. He shows the necessity for this symmetry in staff organization; and I want to say in conclusion on this point that if a necessity exists, as he has so clearly shown, for symmetrical organization and for a lieutenant-colonel to be appointed to effect it, then the sooner it is accomplished the better, and therefore this amendment ought to take effect on the passage of this bill. It will not affect the force at the head of it, but it will affect all subalterns. It opens up the incentive for an officer to raise himself in the esteem of his fellow-officers and his countrymen by his proper bearing. Therefore it should be adopted now.

Mr. President, like the Senators from Kentucky and Nebraska, I do not believe in jumping over officers by staff appointment or otherwise. Who does Maj. Dunwoody jump over? He stands next in the regular order, and if the Chief Signal Officer should die or retire he would not jump, but would succeed to the place in regular order. I would not want to see the President promote him before that event took place. There are officers, and suitable ones I think, captains and lieutenants, who are placed by the choice of the President for life in good places.

This is all right, and sometimes I help to do it, and while the law lasts I want to see my friends get their part of the spoils; and if the President is pleased by certain influences to take a man and jump two hundred and eight captains and make him a major, or to take a lieutenant and jump one hundred and fifty and make him a captain, then let him do it. It is his right, and I hope my friend will be the lucky one. If this is wrong change the law.

That is the liberal view to take of this matter. The man who will likely get this promotion, should it come, is one who, as I said, spends sleepless nights and stands by the ticker until the dawn of day sending information all over this country as to the weather, and this is the result not of luxury but hard and constant study—with marked capacity for combining certain influences and working therefrom a given result. That is what he has done. It is his capacity and his scientific knowledge which have put him in the channel which caused, if you please, his rapid promotion in the service. This is the basis of it.

But I am not for the man. I am for the principle of the thing, Mr. President, regardless of any man. I want some officers to fill these places. It can not be done unless you fill up this corps. I should like to see the colonel appointed now, but the committee says not, and I yield to the judgment of the committee. I believe that now is the time to effect it, and we should not wait for an uncertainty.

The Senator from Kentucky states that they are not amenable to courts-martial. I can not see the philosophy of that. While officers are in the Army and hold commissions in the Army there is nothing that can keep them from being amenable to the courts-martial of the country and the laws of the land. There is nothing in that point, and I will not further notice it.

I do not propose to detain the Senate upon this question. I am sorry even that any debate has sprung up upon it. I agree with the committee upon all questions, except as to the time; and I shall say nothing more in regard to that, but only ask that the Senate will give due consideration to the fact that we want this corps made symmetrical. As I have said, it is indispensable, and it has been the favorite of most men who have been at the head of the Army, and it should be done.

This corps is progressive. The same thing is going on in Europe, here, and everywhere; and I want to see that expertness, if I may so speak, encouraged. It takes but a small sum; it does not create any additional expenditure, because if the brigadier-general stays there he must receive his pay.

I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, to leave this matter as it is, and hope that the Senate will take the view of it which I have taken, and be practical in what we do.

Mr. PROCTOR. I think the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] is comparatively modest in his request. If his amendment is agreed to, it only jumps this major over about one hundred and odd other majors, and nearly one hundred lieutenants-colonel.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Ninety-three.

Mr. BATE. The Senator will pardon me. If I did not say it, I meant to say, of course, in that corps. You can not show that he will jump anybody, because the bill itself provides for promotion in that corps, and there is not a man between him and that position.

Mr. PROCTOR. Very true. It does not jump over many in that corps, but I was speaking of relative rank. I say the amendment is comparatively modest, because the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] gives an opportunity to him and his friend, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who favored the amendment, to get, if they can, the appointment of their political or personal friends to a majority, jumping over the six hundred and fifty captains and the thousand and odd lieutenants, to say nothing about the twenty-five thousand noncommissioned officers and the rank and file of the Army.

So, to be consistent and logical, it would seem that we ought to adopt this much more modest amendment. However, as I voted against the former amendment, I must, to be perfectly consistent, vote against this amendment, much as I regret to do so.

I heartily subscribe to everything that was said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] in regard to the organization of the Army. It seems to me entirely wrong that the staff should be strengthened, and the line, of course, comparatively weakened. It is, as the Senator from Nebraska said, top-heavy. It can be easily seen that with ten brigadiers-general in the War Department and six in the field and with hardly sufficent commands for them that there is something wrong in the organization.

It is not, perhaps, a favorable time to suggest any important change in the staff department. I hope it may come, however, with the general reorganization of the Army. It is not now the time to propose it; but it is a time, Mr. President, when we can see the necessity of an increase in the enlisted force and the strengthening of the line of the Army. The staff positions should be so adjusted to the line that the chance for promotion and preferment will be greatest in the fighting arm of the Army.

I am obliged to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am very glad this discussion has been had. The very wise and sage suggestions which have come from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], the one an ex-Secretary of War, and the other a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of this body, looking to a needed reorganization of the military system of this country, did not come too soon.

So far as the amendment pending is concerned, I rise to withdraw my point of order. I do not mean to make any point of order against the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE]. I am entirely willing, and more than willing, that he shall always have a vote of the Senate, no matter what the rule may be; but I do not believe that his amendment should be adopted; and in his presence here, as he sits close by me, I make this statement, which I am sure he will verify, that it was I in the Committee on Appropriations who strained a point to put into the bill what the Secretary has just read in order to meet the views and wishes of the Senator from Tennessee so far as it was possible for us to do it.

If this amendment should be adopted—I do not mean to say that the Senator from Tennessee intends to do it—speaking from the standpoint of a lawyer, I declare that, in my judgment, the Signal Corps would be put beyond the reach of regulation or order under the War Department; and more, it would be not to complete the symmetry of this corps at all, because the gap would be left precisely as it stands to-day. If the Senator's amendment was agreed to, the symmetry would not be completed, the gap would stand until the present brigadier-general heading that corps should be retired, or until he should resign, or die.

For these two reasons, I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BATE. Permit me to say a word. I think it is proper for us to get as near a consummation of symmetry as possible; if we can not get it entirely, let us get as near to it as we can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. [Putting the question]. The noes appear to have it.

Mr. BATE. I call for a division.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think I shall have to ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. MILLS. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but I shall take the liberty of voting to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORDON. I am authorized to vote to make a quorum, notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and I vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the negative). I find that there is quite a division of sentiment in the Senate in reference to the pending question, and I therefore withdraw my vote, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], with whom I am paired, is not present.

Mr. PUGH. I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. PLATT. I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON], but I am authorized to vote to make a quorum, and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, line 5, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $51,200; in all, $193,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 21, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That hereafter no appointments shall be made to the office of assistant surgeon until the number of assistant surgeons shall be reduced below 90, and thereafter the number of officers in that grade in the medical department shall be fixed at 90.

So as to make the clause read:

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $106,530; in all, $525,230.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 8, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That nothing in the act entitled "An act to increase the number of officers of the Army to be detailed to colleges," approved November 3, 1893, shall be so construed as to prevent, limit, or restrict the detail of retired officers of the Army at institutions of learning under the provisions of section 1260, Revised Statutes, and the act making appropriations for the support of the Army, etc., approved May 4, 1880, nor to forbid the issue of ordnance and ordnance stores, as provided in the act approved September 26, 1888, amending section 1225, Revised Statutes, to the institutions at which retired officers may be so detailed; and said act of November 3, 1893, shall not be construed to allow the full pay of their rank to retired officers detailed under said section 1260, Revised Statutes, and the act of May 4, 1880.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether this proviso is in the language of the bill which the Senate passed in the early days of this session? My impression is that it is in the identical language of that bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the Senator, without the record at my hand, but I assure him that it is in the language of the bill to which he refers, which had the approval of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to say, in connection with the pending proviso, that I am glad to see it inserted here, so that it may be understood elsewhere if there should come up any question as to the wisdom of the provision, that there was certainly no intention on the part of Congress in passing the act recited as approved November 3, 1893, to cut off the detail of retired officers of the Army to educational institutions throughout the country.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is true.

Mr. MANDERSON. And yet the construction placed upon it——

Mr. BLACKBURN. But the Senator will admit that a different construction was placed upon the law by the Department.

Mr. MANDERSON. I was about to say that the law by the executive department was so construed. The result of it was that a great many valuable military instructors were taken from those institutions, and can perhaps only be returned by way of detail if this provision shall become the law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. It permits such details, and provides that they shall not receive the full pay of their rank; but, of course, they can eke out whatever pay is coming to them on the retired list by any sum which any educational institution may see fit to pay for military instruction. It certainly is a very proper addendum to the existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 8, after line 13, to insert the following:

For clerks and messengers at the headquarters of the Army and at the several department headquarters; at the recruiting headquarters and depots; at the Military Academy at West Point; at the Artillery School at Fort Monroe, Va.; at the Infantry and Cavalry School at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and at the Cavalry and Light Artillery School at Fort Riley, Kans., not exceeding 90 clerks, at $1,000 each; 25 clerks, at $1,100 each; 10 clerks, at $1,200 each, and 45 messengers, at $720 each, $152,800; and said clerks and messengers shall be employed and apportioned to the several headquarters and stations by the Secretary of War. And the "Act for the enlistment and pay and to define the duties and liabilities of 'general-service clerks' and 'general-service messengers' in the Army," approved July 29, 1886, is hereby repealed.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator from Kentucky kindly explain to the Senate what is the change in the existing law made by this provision? Is there a reduction of the number of service clerks and messengers?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No.

Mr. MANDERSON. Is there a reduction in the amount of their compensation?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then, what is the provision which is repealed?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer and say that this is a transposition. If the Senator will turn to page 2, from line 9 to line 18, inclusive, which was stricken out upon the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, he will find that this is simply a transposition. The Department urged this substitution, which the committee has submitted for the consideration of the Senate.

It looks to a reduction of the force; but it does more. The point in it, and the only point in it which has any merit or which would attract any attention or excite any discussion, is that it looks to the abolition of a practice which has grown up here in the shape of a civil pension list, what are called general service clerks, made up from details from the Army and appointments from civil life, and after so many years' service they go upon the retired list.

A man appointed from civil life to a clerical position in any Department of this Government has no right to go upon the pension list or upon the retired list. It is the object of the amendment which the committee submits to put a stop to that practice. It is simply to compel the War Department to detail those clerks from the Army and not appoint them from civil life, with the chance to get upon the retired list by reason of clerical service which is not allowed to anybody else.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope that that conclusion will not be reached. While I do not oppose this proviso, for I feel the uselessness of making head against the Committee on Appropriations in matters of this sort, I do not believe in the detailing of enlisted men of the Army for clerk service, or any other service. They enlist as soldiers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly. I may have misunderstood the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska, but will the Senator say he does favor a practice that exists under the law to-day and that the amendment seeks to remedy, which allows a clerk appointed from civil life after thirty years of service to go upon the retired list as though he had been a soldier?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, I do not, unless the clerk assumes the position of an enlisted man, and can be held to a term of service and be called upon for military duty. Of course, in time of war it is well understood that any civil employé of the Army of the United States can be called upon for military service, and he can be compelled to perform the duties incident to his place.

But I understand the general service clerks and general service messengers are liable to removal, or can at any time quit their occupations. With that as the fact, I certainly do not believe that that class of men should ever go upon a retired list or a civil pension list for such service.

However, that which I rose to combat was the idea that there should be taken from the enlisted force of the Army men for clerk duty or for any other duty foreign to the employment for which they have been enlisted.

One of the evils which the Army has had to contend with for many years has been the use of the enlisted force not only for clerk service, but for menial service. The man who wears the uniform of the Government of the United States and who is to be called upon to protect its flag and to sustain its honor should not be the servant of anybody except the Government of the United States. You get in the Army, I think, an inferior class of men when it is understood that they can be detailed or required to perform duty which is not incident to the military service. It is an evil which we certainly ought to reach. The Army of the United States is its peacemaker. If anything were needed to exemplify and emphasize that fact it can be found in the occurrences of the last few days in this country.

The Army of the United States is small. I should not advocate its great extension, and yet, realizing the fact that it is no greater in the number of its enlisted men to-day, with nearly 70,000,000 people, than it was when this country had but 30,000,000 people, I believe there should be an increase in the number of enlisted men. It should be an increase looking to its growth in the best material that can be obtained. A move was made in the right direction by legislation had at this session of Congress, which required that none but American citizens should be enlisted in the Army of the United States, and that they should have a certain degree of intelligence.

That legislation, I think, will improve the material which will compose the Army. I think the Army should be increased within a moderate and modest number, so that incident to that increase there should come a better organization of the Army. It is an astonishing thing to me that the Congress of the United States, throughout all these years of insistence, these years of persuasion on the part of the chief military men of this country, should still hold to the obsolete in military affairs.

Commencing with Gen. Grant, when he was at the head of the Army, following him Gen. Sherman, Gen. Sheridan, Gen. Schofield, and every department commander without exception, and every man who has written upon military life in the United States, all have insisted that there should be a departure from the present single-battalion organization of the infantry of this country and that the three-battalion organization should obtain.

The attention of Congress has been called time and again to the fact that the United States, holding to the single-battalion organization, has a military organization which is shared in only by two countries. One is Persia and the other China. That is the company which we are keeping with reference to the organization of our infantry. When the time of war shall come we shall be quick to adopt the three-battallion organization, which is a necessity under the improved arm that is now used in all the armies of the world. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that in several Congresses such a bill has received the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and has passed the Senate, it has gone elsewhere, there to sleep apparently the sleep that knows no waking.

I hope that as the result of this discussion and as the result of the events that are now or have been lately upon us the Congress of the United States will arouse itself to the importance of bettering the condition of the Army and putting it in a position where it can sustain itself with credit and not be compelled when an emergency shall arise, or war shall come upon us, to make a complete revolution in the character of its formation.

I hope I misunderstood the Senator from Kentucky in the suggestion he made that this proviso would permit enlisted men to be detailed to service as general service clerks and messengers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; the Senator from Nebraska did not misunderstand me, and he will not misunderstand me in this, that I sympathize with his conclusions as he has expressed them. It is not my purpose to advocate the detail of enlisted men for clerical service, but the Senator who, in conjunction with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], for so many years presided over the military affairs of this country, at least so far as the Senate has charge, knows that that has been the practice all these years. Those soldiers are detailed, and I doubt not that very competent men are found to render that service.

Neither the bill as it came from the other House nor any amendment submitted by the committee of the Senate touches that practice at all. It may be a bad practice. I am not its advocate; I am not its apologist. The only point that I make is that it is a mongrel service; it is a hybrid service. It is made of details from the line, of enlisted men and of men appointed from civil life. The amendment seeks to prevent the apointees from civil life from going upon a civil pension list after thirty years' service. That is all there is in this matter.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is a different proposition.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all there is in it.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am inclined to differ with my friend from Kentucky in the construction of this paragraph. I do not believe it means that you can take an enlisted man and give him a clerkship letting him remain an enlisted man in the Army and making him a clerk at $1,100 or $1,200 per annum, or make him a messenger with that compensation in addition to his other pay. That is what it would mean unless he was retired from the enlisted service.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is what is done.

Mr. MANDERSON. It ought not to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 9, line 16, after the word "troops," to insert "at stations;" so as to make the clause read:

For commutation of quarters to commissioned officers on duty without troops at stations where there are no public quarters, $165,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 16, after the word "that," to strike out "in disbursing this amount" and insert "hereafter;" in line 17, after the words "paid to," to strike out "an" and insert "any," and in line 18, after the word "officer," to insert "of the Army;" so as to make the clause read:

For mileage to officers when traveling on duty without troops, when authorized by law, not to exceed $140,000, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to the War Department and to the several military departments; and not more than three-fifths of said amount shall be expended during the first half of the fiscal year, and not more than one-half of the remainder during each of the remaing quarters: Provided, That hereafter the maximum sum to be allowed and paid to any officer of the Army shall be 4 cents per mile, distance to be computed over the shortest usually traveled routes, and in addition thereto the cost of the transportation actually paid by the officer over said route or routes, exclusive of parlor-car or sleeping-car fare and transfers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 20, on page 11.

Mr. MANDERSON. The last clause of this paragraph makes a very decided change in Army regulations and in existing law. I am inclined to think that the purpose desired to be accomplished is a good one, but I fear that the pendulum has swung too far in the other direction. It will be noticed that by this wording no Army or department commander can order an inspection of any post or any part of his department.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me ask my friend what amendment he wants.

Mr. MANDERSON. I shall offer an amendment which I think will commend itself, because it is mild in its terms.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not mean to abridge or restrict the powers of a department commander. What is it that the Senator from Nebraska wants?

Mr. MANDERSON. I propose after the word "commanders" in line 16 to insert:

Or are ordered by Army and department commanders in cases of emergency.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. It seems to me that is right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is right.

Mr. MANDERSON. I wish to say a few words in addition to show abundantly the reasons for it. These departments are very large in territory. Many of them contain numerous posts. Frequently there is an absolute necessity for an inspection. For instance, there is an outbreak of malarial fever or some other disease at one of the garrisons. An immediate inspection by the Medical Department is an absolute necessity.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I agree to that.

Mr. MANDERSON. And the usual red-tape would not have to be undergone under the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 16, after the word "commands," insert "or are ordered by army and department commanders in cases of emergency."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I see that amendments are being made in the general text as we go along, and that we are not following the usual rule of confining the consideration in this stage to amendments reported by the committee.

I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to page 11, beginning with line 4. There is this provision:

That the transportation furnished by the Quartermaster's Department to officers traveling without troops shall be limited to transportation in kind, not including sleeping or parlor car accommodations, over free roads, over bond-aided Pacific railroads, and by conveyande belonging to said Department.

I do not quite understand that provision. I understand that in dealing with the free roads, on which the Government has a right to send officers, you have not a right to impose upon them the duty of giving sleeping car or parlor car accommodations to officers. But when an officer is sent on a duty which requires him to travel two or three days steadily, is he not allowed the cost of his sleeping-car accommodations?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; he is not, under the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the fact as to that?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut, who so long presided over the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, does not need to have me remind him that the law does not give an officer his sleeping-car fare, but it gives him his mileage, which is presumed to cover it.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what I wanted to ascertain, whether it is allowed for in some other way.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the way it is allowed for.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I understand that the mileage covers it and allows the officer to ride in such cars?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It does.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 11, on page 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to line 10, on page 13, where, after the word "issue," there is a colon. Should it not simply be a comma?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Chair is correct. I ask that the correction be made. That is a clear mistake. It should be a comma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made, without objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 13, line 25, after the word "shall," to strike out "cause to be investigated by the inspection department of the Army, or otherwise, and shall;" and on page 14, line 2, after the word "session," to strike out "as to;" so as to make the clause read:

And the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at its next regular session the number of civil employés of the Army, their distribution, the necessity for their employment, and the cost attending the same: Provided, That $100,000 of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase and delivery in June, 1894, of such subsistence supplies as may be required to be at posts at the beginning of the fiscal year 1895.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is simply a correction of the text. There is nothing material in the amendment and I ask that it be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 14, after line 9, to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove to the Fort Sill military reservation, Indian Territory, the Indian prisoners of war now confined at Mount Vernon Barracks, Alabama, and for the purposes of the erection of buildings, purchase of draft animals, stock, necessary farming tools, seeds, household utensils, and other articles needed for said Indians and generally for their support and civilization, the sum of $15,000 is hereby appropriated, in addition to the sums herein appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 11, strike out of the amendment the words "the Fort Sill military reservation, Indian Territory," and insert "such military reservation as he may select, not prohibited by existing law."

Mr. BLACKBURN. So far as I am concerned, I accept the amendment to the amendment.

I wish to state that an anomaly exists in the case of these Indians, the Geronimo band. They are now in Alabama, as prisoners of war, where they have been all these years. Sixty per cent of the number of that band to-day were born prisoners of war. It is an anomaly in the civilization of this country. More than one-half of that band of Indians at the Mount Vernon barracks in Alabama, were born into this world as prisoners of war, and are so held to-day. The purpose of the committee is to do what every Secretary of War for the last twelve years has endeavored to do, to get rid of this anomaly and send the Indians back somewhere.

I know the Senator from Idaho does not want them in his country. Nobody else wants them. But they should be turned loose. Children who are born prisoners of war ought not to be required to die of old age as prisoners of war. The Senator's amendment is a perfectly fair one, leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of War to put these people somewhere and take them away from where they are, and so far as I am concerned I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. PLATT. I think that when this matter gets into conference perhaps some additional phraseology should be inserted to show what is to be done with these people when they are removed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That may be.

Mr. PLATT. If they are still to be held as prisoners of war, I do not see how they are going to be educated in farming and such matters.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I take it that the conference committee will look into the matter.

Mr. PLATT. I think the whole matter should be looked into in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 10, after the word "infantry," to insert "members of the Hospital Corps;" so to as read:

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Regular supplies: For the regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, consisting of stoves and heating apparatus and repair and maintenance of the same, for heating offices, hospitals, and barracks and quarters; of ranges and stoves and appliances for cooking and serving food; of fuel and lights for enlisted men, guards, hospitals, storehouses, and offices, and for sale to officers; for the equipment of bakehouses to carry on post bakeries; for the necessary furniture, text-books, paper, and equipments for the post schools and libraries; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men of the Army; of forage in kind for the horses, mules, and oxen of the Quartermaster's Department at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, including its care and protection, and for the horses of the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of artillery, and such companies of infantry, members of the Hospital Corps, and scouts as may be mounted, and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; of straw for soldiers' bedding; and of stationery, including blank books, for the Quartermaster's Department, certificates for discharged soldiers, blank forms for the Pay and Quartermaster's Departments, and for printing division and department orders and reports, $2,400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert, "but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War for his approval;" so as to make the additional proviso read:

Provided further, That after advertisement all the supplies for the use of the various departments and posts of the Army shall be purchased where the same can be purchased the cheapest, quality and cost of transportation considered, except that purchases may be made in open market, in the manner common among business men, when the aggregate amount required does not exceed $200; but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War for his approval.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The same amendment appears again probably more than once in the bill, and I ask that it be agreed to. It simply requires that purchases made outside of advertisement shall be at once reported to the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 25, after the word "pursuit," to insert:

And no greater sum than $30 for each deserter shall be paid to any officer or citizen for such service and expenses.

On page 17, line 5, after the word "infantry," to insert "members of the Hospital Corps," and in line 6, after the word "mounted," to insert "the authorized number of officers' horses;" so as to make the clause read:

INCIDENTAL EXPENSES.

For postage; cost of telegrams on official business received and sent by officers of the Army; extra pay to soldiers employed on extra duty under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department in the erection of barracks, quarters, and storehouses, in the construction of roads, and other constant labor, for periods of not less than ten days, and as clerks for post quartermasters at military posts; for expenses of expresses to and from the frontier posts and armies in the field, of escorts to paymasters and other disbursing officers, and to trains, where military escorts can not be furnished; expenses of the interment of officers killed in action or who die when on duty in the field or at military posts or on the frontiers or when traveling under orders, and of noncommissioned officers and soldiers; authorized office furniture; hire of laborers in the Quartermaster's Department, including the hire of interpreters, spies, or guides for the Army; compensation of clerks and other employés to the officers of the Quartermaster's Department; for the apprehension, securing, and delivering of deserters and the expenses incident to their pursuit, and no greater sum than $30 for each deserter shall be paid to any officer or citizen for such service and expenses; and for the following expenditures required for the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of light artillery, and such companies of infantry, members of the Hospital Corps, and scouts as may be mounted, the authorized number of officers' horses, and for the trains, to wit, hire of veterinary surgeons, purchase of medicine for horses and mules, picket ropes, blacksmith's tools and materials, horseshoes and blacksmith's tools for the cavalry service, and for the shoeing of horses and mules, and such additional expenditures as are necessary and authorized by law in the movements and operation of the Army and at military posts, and not expressly assigned to any other department, $600,000: Provided, That $200,000 of the appropriation for incidental expenses, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be set aside for the payment of enlisted men on extra duty at constant labor of not less than ten days in the Quartermaster's Department, but no such payment shall be made at any greater rate per day than is fixed by law for the class of persons employed at the work done therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 10, on page 18.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to insert in line 1, page 18, after the word "be," the words "required to be;" so as to read:

For the purchase of horses for the cavalry and artillery, and for the Indian scouts, and for such infantry and members of the Hospital Corps in campaigns as may be required to be mounted, and the expenses incident thereto, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 21, line 3, before the word "dollars," to insert "one hundred thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks and quarters for troops, storehouses for the safe keeping of military stores, for offices, and for the hire of buildings and grounds for summer cantonments, and for temporary buildings at frontier stations, for the construction of temporary buildings and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts, $650,000: Provided, That no more than $1,100,000 of the sums appropriated by this act shall be paid out for the services of civilian employés in the Quartermaster's Department, including those heretofore paid out of the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, Army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage; that no employé paid therefrom shall receive as salary more than $150 per month, unless the same shall be specially fixed by law; and no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel and for quarters to officers or enlisted men.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 4, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of War to purchase land for a rifle range at Sackets Harbor, near Madison Barracks, New York, at such sum and price as he may deem reasonable, not to exceed $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Medical and Hospital Department: For the purchase of medical and hospital supplies, including disinfectants for general post sanitation, expenses of medical purveying depots, pay of employés, medical care and treatment of officers and enlisted men of the Army and Signal Corps on duty at posts and stations for which no other provision is made, for the proper care and treatment of cases in the Army suffering from contagious and epidemic diseases, and the supply of the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., advertising, and other miscellaneous expenses of the Medical Department, $175,000; and not over $40,000 of the money appropriated by this paragraph shall be applied to the payment of civilian employés of the Medical Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 10, on page 23.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In line 10, page 23, after the word "Department," I move on behalf of the committee and upon the request of the Department to insert the following:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized after due advertisement to sell, under such conditions as he may prescribe, such quantity of surplus liquors and such unserviceable medical and hospital stores, or other property at the medical supply depots at New York, St. Louis, and San Francisco, or in the custody of the medical department, as the Secretary of War may deem proper; the proceeds of such sale, after deducting expenses thereof, to be paid into the United States Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 23, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten," and in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Medical Museum and Library: For Army Medical Museum, preservation of specimens, and the preparation and purchase of new specimens, $5,000; for the library of the Surgeon-General's Office, $10,000; in all, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert:

but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War for his approval;

so as to make the clause read:

Purchase of ordnance and ordnance stores and supplies may be made by the Ordnance Department in open market, in the manner common among business men, when the aggregate of the purchase does not exceed $200, but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War for his approval.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of machine guns, improved musket caliber, of American manufacture, $10,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am sorry that the committee recommends a reduction. I was glad to see that the other House had put it at $20,000. That is the figure at which it rested for a number of years. There is scarcely anything in the military arm that has made such improvement and advances as these machine guns. They are now going on trial—on a competitive examination, so to speak. The competitive examination is going on in this neighborhood, down at Indian Head.

The National Guard of the several States have a great fancy, and very wisely and properly, for having a machine gun attached to each regiment, and independent of these, private persons, for the defense of their manufacturing establishments, occasionally buy a machine gun. I think myself that $20,000 would be a good figure, but I offer to compromise with the Senator on $15,000.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will do better than that. I will say to my friend, who so long and so ably presided over the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and who, I am sure, knows more about this matter than I do, that when we adopted this amendment it was not with any purpose of doing any more than carrying the matter to conference, where the Senator from Connecticut might be heard. I will agree now, so far as I am concerned, either to let it go to conference and remit him to his chances to make good the merits of the measure he is advocating, or I will accept his proposition right now, and put it at $15,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Bargain seems to be in order. If my friend will stick to it in conference, I shall be very much obliged to him to make it fifteen thousand.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will make it good. What is the Senator's amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I propose to change ten thousand to fifteen tnousand.

Mr. BLACKBURN. To that I agree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the committee is to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen" before the word "thousand;" so as to read:

For purchase of machine guns, improved musket caliber, of American manufacture, $15,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 26, line 19, after the words "rendezvous to," to strike out "depot" and insert "military posts;" and on page 27, line 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits from rendezvous to military posts, including sending of recruiting parties to small towns, and not exceeding $1,200 for the payment of a clerk to the officer disbursing the appropriation; also, including the actual and necessary cost of transportation of accepted applicants from their homes to places of enlistment, when authorized by the Secretary of War, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 16, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eleven thousand five hundred," and insert "seventeen thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, as follows: Purchase, equipment, and repair of field electric telegraphs, signal equipments, and stores; binocular glasses, telescopes, heliostats, and other necessary instruments, including absolutely necessary meteorological instruments for use on target ranges; telephone apparatus (excluding exchange service) and maintenance of the same; maintenance and repair of military telegraph lines (excluding the military telegraph line, Fort Ringgold, Texas, to Fort McIntosh, Texas), including salaries of civilian employés, supplies and general repairs, and other expenses connected with the duty of collecting and transmitting information for the Army by telegraph or otherwise, $17,000.

Mr. MILLS. I should like to ask my friend why it is that this military telegraph line from Fort Ringgold, Texas, to Fort McIntosh, Texas, is excluded? I suppose it is provided for elsewhere.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is already provided for.

Mr. MILLS. That is what I supposed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 16, to insert:

For constructing and operating a military telegraph line between El Paso, Tex., and New Fort Bliss, Texas, $960.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 9, after the words "direction of the," to strike out "Adjutant-General of the Army" and insert "Secretary of War;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expense of the military information division, Adjutant-General's Office, and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $3,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask consent of the Senate that the clerks may be allowed to correct the totals and footings, if it shall be necessary, in order to conform to the amendments which the Senate has adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection that request will be considered as granted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. BRICE, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CULLOM was appointed.

IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask leave at this time to present an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the sundry civil appropriation bill. The amendment is for the purpose of determining the water supply of the United States with a view to irrigation, including the investigation of underground currents, and the boring in arid and semiarid sections of experimental artesian wells. The appropriation proposed by the amendment is $25,000. I ask that the amendment may be printed and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. MANDERSON. In connection with the amendment, I desire to read a part of a letter I have here, which comes from such a source that it should carry great weight, not only with the Committee on Irrigation, but with the Committee on Appropriations.

This matter is to those of us who live in the semiarid or arid sections of the country, comprising a part of the western portion of the States of Nebraska, Kansas, the Dakotas, and the countries about the Rocky Mountains, and west thereof, of vast importance, and there has been very great lack, it seems to me, of interest by the executive branch of the Government and by Congress in this subject-matter.

I have here a letter, which I received to-day, and which was invited by me after considerable conversation with the gentleman who wrote it, who has a high reputation in the country as a geologist, and one who has given this subject very much thought. He says:

In continuation of the matter discussed in our recent conversation, I beg to submit the following statement:

The investigations by the Geological Survey into the water resources of the country have been carried on in the past under the general appropriations, with the ultimate object of obtaining facts similar to those collected and published regarding the mineral resources.

He then goes on to state that the Secretary of the Interior has made a recommendation for the appropriation of $5,000 "for gauging the streams and determining the water supply of the United States."

He goes on to say further that this is entirely too small to reach the purpose desired, and shows the character of survey or exploration which has already been made. I shall insert this letter in the RECORD, with leave, as part of my remarks, simply calling attention now to these facts:

Petitions and requests are constantly being received that actual tests be undertaken in all parts of the country, especially upon the Great Plains, and while it may be questionable whether or not such tests should be undertaken by the Government, there can be no doubt but that this survey should be in a position to determine whether there is reasonable probability of obtaining artesian water at different points.

The study of existing artesian conditions, made for the Census Office, demonstrated that thousands of failures could have been prevented and hundreds of thousands of dollars saved in experimental drillings had full information as to the probabilities been sought before the expenditures were made. On the other hand, it is highly probable that undiscovered artesian basins can be pointed out, or at least chances of success determined before drillings are made. This, however, can only follow upon a thorough examination of the conditions which govern the occurrence and distribution of waters.

He then goes on to recommend that the provision in the amendment I have introduced be inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill. I ask leave to insert this letter in the RECORD, so that the Committee on Irrigation may have the benefit of the very valuable suggestions made by this gentleman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1894.

HON. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate:

SIR: In continuation of the matter discussed in our recent convention, I beg to submit the following statement:

The investigations by the Geological Survey into the water resources of the country have been carried on in the past under the general appropriations, with the ultimate object of obtaining facts similar to those collected and published regarding the mineral resources. It is stated, however, that the Secretary of the Interior has decided that such work should be continued only under specific appropriations, and, being convinced of its value, has asked that the following clause be inserted in the sundry civil bill, under the head of the Geological Survey: "For gauging the streams and determining the water supply of the United States, $5,000."

This amount is recognised as being too small to carry on any extensive work, but it is to be presumed that the desire to keep down the total amount of the bill and not infringe upon other items for the Survey has necessitated this action. It is known that the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Survey are both favorably inclined toward the work. It rests, therefore, with Senators who are interested to increase this amount should they deem the investigation essential.

The object of the Survey has been to study certain representative streams ascertain the fluctuations of water supply, and at the same time obtain all facts accessible concerning the underground waters, their movements and availability for use. Thus the results are valuable, not only in all considerations of water power and municipal supply, but also in the questions of irrigation development now so pressing in the West. That the work is generally appreciated is shown by the numerous inquiries constantly reaching the Survey regarding the possibilities of the development of efficient supplies of water from various streams or deep wells.

Some of these questions it is possible to answer, while to satisfactorily solve other problems will require thorough examination. Questions concerning the feasibility of attempts to secure artesian waters are particularly difficult, and at the same time are of great importance to persons or localities demanding a full knowledge of the facts. Petitions and requests are constantly being received that actual tests be undertaken in all parts of the country, especially upon the Great Plains, and while it may be questionable whether or not such tests should be undertaken by the Government, there can be no doubt but that this Survey should be in a position to determine whether there is reasonable probability of obtaining artesian water at different points.

The study of existing artesian conditions, made for the Census Office, demonstrated that thousands of failures could have been prevented and hundreds of thousands of dollars saved in experimental drillings had full information as to the probabilities been sought before the expenditures were made. On the other hand, it is highly probable that undiscovered artesian basins can be pointed out, or at least chances of success determined, before drillings are made. This, however, can only follow upon a thorough examination of the conditions which govern the occurrence and distribution of waters.

It should be noted that the Survey has at this time a full equipment for carrying on the investigation of the waters flowing in streams or possibly occurring underground, and still retains a number of men trained in the especial operations and in the use of instruments, such as current meters, etc., needed for such purpose. An investigation of this character is essentially a survey, and can only be carried on efficiently by an organization similar to that of the Geological Survey.

In order to obtain results of any considerable value the item should be increased to from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars. With this sum efficient work can be done in many localities demanding immediate attention.

The reason that the original request for $5,000 was not for a larger sum is that this amount was taken from the topographic item in order not to increase the total sum asked for. This seemed to be as much as could be spared without injury to the topographic division.

MILITARY RESERVATION TO OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask consent of the Senate for the immediate consideration of House bill 6080, which is a bill granting to the city of Oklahoma, in Oklahoma Territory, an abandoned military reservation for school purposes, with the reservation of 10 acres to a man by the name of Miller, and reserving certain rights. The bill has been thoroughly considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and has been agreed to by all the parties in interest. I should like to have it passed immediately, as it is a matter of considerable importance to the people in Oklahoma Territory.

Mr. CALL. I have given notice that I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill at the conclusion of the army appropriation bill. I shall not, however, object to the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Kansas, if it does not consume much time.

Mr. MARTIN. I am sure it will not.

Mr. CALL. If the bill will not consume time, I shall give way to the Senator for the present.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6080) granting a certain military reservation to Oklahoma City, Oklahoma Territory, to aid the public free schools thereof, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, at the end of section 2, line 15, after the word "city," to insert:

That prior to the division and sale of said lands, as provided for in the third section of this act, said city of Oklahoma shall, by proper deed, convey to Benjamin S. Miller 10 acres of said land in the form of a square, as nearly as practicable, out of the northwest corner of said southwest quarter of section 34, in township numbered 12, north of range 3 west: Provided, That said Miller shall at the same time, by a proper instrument in writing, release and assign to said city of Oklahoma any and all right and interest that he may have in or to the remainder of said quarter section of land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "purchasers," in line 9, at the end of section 3, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SOUTH CANADIAN RIVER BRIDGE.

sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Kansas if there is a clause reserving to Congress the power to alter, repeal, or amend the proposed act?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

The bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Purcell Bridge and Transfer Company to construct and maintain a bridge over the South Canadian River at or within 1 mile of the town of Lexington, county of Cleveland, Territory of Oklahoma."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 10, insert:

Mr. CALL. I will state that the amendment is rendered necessary by the recent storm which has destroyed the works there and the protection which they gave.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 14, on page 9.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 14, on page 9, insert the following proviso:

Mr. CALL. The committee have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg leave to present an amendment to come in on page 7, after line 9.

The amendment has the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs, and has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It has not been reported from the Committee on Appriations and is not a part of the bill. I wish to submit it for the consideration of the Senator from Florida and the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 9, page 7, insert:

To enable the Board of Ordnance and Fortification to procure and test one 10-inch pneumatic disappearing gun carriage of the Pneumatic Gun Carriage and Power Company's design, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to contract with the Pneumatic Gun Carriage and Power Company, of Washington, D. C., without advertising, for said carriage, which shall be constructed on the general plan submitted by the company to the Board of Ordnance and Fortification in its letter dated February 22, 1894, and shall be capable of being traversed and the gun elevated and depressed by either pneumatic, electric, or hand power, and the details of said plan may be modified, changed, and improved in the discretion of said company.

The same conditions relative to the platform, ammunition, and payments, etc., embodied in the contract for the Gordon 10-inch counterpoise carriage shall apply to the pneumatic carriage, and the same facilities for carrying out the contract for the counterpoise carriage shall be extended to the pneumatic carriage. The sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for the purchase of the said pneumatic carriage: Provided, That the Secretary of War, before making any payments under the said contract, shall require the company to furnish satisfactory bonds to him to return the money if the carriage is not accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, buying carriages for guns for coast defense is a very serious business. They are very costly to construct in order to bear the modern high-power rifle and to be operated with ease. In our days military men require that a gun carriage shall be a disappearing one, that it shall be entirely out of sight of the enemy while it is being loaded, and that it shall be easily uplifted, so as to fire over the parapet and then quickly drop down into the pit to be again loaded.

There have been two 10-inch disappearing gun carriages built by the War Department for test as to the best for use for coast defense purposes, the pneumatic disappearing gun carriage, weighing 48 tons, and the counterpoise disappearing gun carriage, weighing 300 tons. One was invented by a civilian, the other, I believe, was the invention of an officer of the Army. These are the only competitors, although as I understand there is another gun carriage being built, I am not sure of that, however. I fear I may do an injustice by failing to describe it correctly, so I will say nothing about it. They are ingenious and able men.

There are now under contract and being constructed 56 10-inch guns, according to the report of the Chief of Ordnance. The cost of the carriages for these 56 guns, according to the War Department estimates, is $35,000 each, making a total of $1,960,000. It is of some consequence then, as a matter of money, that it should be well done and if possible economically done, though the first consideration of course is excellence.

The total number of 10-inch guns required for the coast defenses, according to the official estimate, is 222, and the amount necessary to supply carriages will be in the neighborhood of $8,000,000. This is according to the elaborate plan submitted by the famous board a few years ago, which is being pursued, though with rather slow and faltering steps, especially this year, as a spirit of economy is necessarily upon us.

The two disappearing carriages of which I spoke have both been tested, accepted and paid for as working to the satisfaction of the Department. It is not yet settled which is the better and which shall be adopted uniformly.

The Board of Ordnance and Fortification has given a contract to Capt. Gordon to build another gun carriage, similar to the one which has been accepted, to cost $47,000.

The rival concern, the Pneumatic Gun Carriage Company, has taken the contract for the new Gordon carriage, which specifies times of movements, etc., and now proposes to build a carriage, in every particular superior to it, guaranteed to fire twelve rounds an hour, which is extraordinary rapidity for these heavy rifles. The company guarantees that the carriage will enable the gun to fire twelve rounds an hour to the counterpoise carriage's ten, and perhaps, the promoters say, it will fire eighteen, to maneuver the gun by one man, to the counterpoise carriage's fifteen, and the company will agree to build and deliver future carriages at a less price than that at which the Government can purchase the counterpoise carriage.

It also agrees that the carriage shall be built at its own expense and at its own risk, and it is not to cost the Government one cent if it does not work to the satisfaction of the War Department and prove superior to its competitor. I do not know how a more favorable offer could be made to the Government. If the carriage is accepted by the War Department as satisfactory, the company is to be paid $50,000, and I suppose it would naturally expect a share of the gun carriages to be built hereafter.

The two carriages for this competitive test will cost about the same. The Pneumatic Gun Carriage Company has just finished its contract with the Navy Department for installing its complete pneumatic system on the double turreted monitor Terror. That is the company in behalf of whose gun carriage I offer the amendment. It is to install a complete pneumatic system on the double turreted monitor Terror. The company furnishes four 10-inch gun-carriages, ammunition hoists, rammers, apparatus for revolving the turrets, and steering and refrigerating the ship, all to be worked by compressed air. One of the arguments made against this carriage is that compressed air is not a satisfactory medium for working these heavy carriages. They are adopting it largely, however, in the Navy.

Capt. John A. Howell, United States Navy, a man who is accepted as a very high authority indeed upon scientific questions, and especially as to matters concerning the Navy, who commanded at that time the Washington navy-yard and was president of the board of officers which recommended the contract for the pneumatic system on the Terror, and who is the inventor of the Howell torpedo, says:

The advantages peculiar to the pneumatic carriage are reduced weight of the system, since the gun is counterpoised by an air spring, weighing a few pounds, instead of weights, far exceeding the weight of the gun; this reduces all the work necessary to handle the gun in the same proportion.

The use of one fluid, air for handling the gun in all particulars, as controlling recoil, returning to battery, loading and training and elevating, if required, is in the direction of simplicity, combined with efficiency. No other system will have as high a coefficient of excellence, considering all the requisites of a disappearing gun in the coast defences.

I shall not undertake to describe to those who have not examined the matter the difference between those two plans, but I can perhaps convey the idea of a counterpoise battery. The enormous weight of the gun has to be counterbalanced by something else, even if great blocks of iron. The gun is thus depressed by swinging this great mass, whereas, with the pneumatic machine, the process bears a certain resemblance to the use of steam. Compressed air is the power necessary to elevate, depress, train, etc.

Mr. Lewis Nixon, the designer of the warship New York, late an officer of the Navy and now the naval architect of the great firm of Cramp & Co., who are successfully building ships, says:

The counterpoise carriage with its cumbrous parts, has been supplanted by the hydropneumatic carriage abroad. I am perfectly familiar with both these types, counterpoise and pneumatic, and am satisfied that the pneumatic carriage is simpler and more efficient than the standard carriage of Europe, and no more liable to derangement than the counterpoise carriage.

One man can do the work on the pneumatic carriage in elevating, traversing, and lifting the gun that must be done by fifteen men with the counterpoise. A small crew can be much more easily handled under the demoralizing effects of battle than a large one.

My opinion is, after following the development of the disappearing carriage with great interest for several years, that the use of compressed air for handling guns has passed all stages of experiment, and has demonstrated its efficiency over all other methods, as it is absolutely reliable.

I have also here, which I might quote, other opinions and a report of Capt. Fletcher, of the Navy, who went abroad and examined the matter, and who describes the use of air in handling heavy guns. I will read a brief extract from his report to the Navy Department. He says:

In certain types of disappearing carriages for land fortifications and coast defense a small reservoir of air under pressure is employed for raising the gun to the firing position after the recoil. This system was successfully applied to a 6-inch naval carriage, built some years ago by the Bureau of Ordnance. Since that date it has met with favor abroad, particularly in Italy, where it is now used for raising guns of 67 tons weight.

Now, I have no criticisms and no controversies with the able gentlemen on that great board of ordnance or with our Ordnance Department. They have comparatively limited sums of money to expend, and must do the best they can with what they have. It is my sincere judgment that it is worth while for the War Department to make the experiment with this carriage. It is not to cost the Government one dollar unless it is freely accepted by the War Department after it is built. The one which has been built and which the Government owns now, works to general satisfaction.

I think the War Department, it is my mere surmise, would probably be very glad to try both of these carriages. They have not the money, however, and their success in asking for large sums of money is not so great as to encourage them. At any rate, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, I propose the amendment which has been read.

Mr. HUNTON. There seems to be a general disposition to adopt the amendment, and that being the case I do not desire to detain the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I will state that the amendment, substantially at least, is recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs. Is the amendment in the language of the amendment recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HAWLEY. I so stated, but there is so much confusion in the Chamber that the Senator from Florida probably did not hear me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to offer an amendment. The bill as it now stands provides that—

The owners of hotels and other nonmilitary buildings now at Fort Monroe, Va., shall bear one-half of the expense of construction of the said sewer, and the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to equitably and justly apportion among, assess against, and collect from the said owners and to expend in construction of the said sewer the moiety of the estimated cost thereof; and he is also authorized and directed from time to time to cause to be assessed upon and collected from the owners of nonmilitary buildings situated within the limits of the Fort Monroe military reservation, and from individuals or corporations engaged in business thereat, such sum or sums of money as he may deem just, reasonable, and necessary for expenditure upon the repair and operation of existing works, or the construction, improvement, maintenance, and operation of such other works, such as roads, streets, lights, sewerage, and general police, as, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, should be constructed and maintained in order to protect the interests of the United States, and the interests, health, and general welfare of the said nonmilitary interests now established or that may hereafter be established at Fort Monroe.

That provision of the bill makes the Secretary of War the legislature to determine when public work shall be undertaken, and to determine further who shall pay for it. The owners of hotels and nonmilitary buildings at Fortress Monroe are perfectly willing to pay for the present sewerage system, which has been laid out by the Secretary of War. It meets the approbation of the citizens of that place and they are perfectly willing to pay their proportion of it; but they are not willing that the Secretary of War shall in the future determine when similar works are necessary and to assess the inhabitants of the place for such sums as he may please to pay for such works as he may determine are necessary for that place.

I beg to say to the Senate that this provision in the bill, as it came from the House, was the result of an accident. I am informed by the gentleman who represents the district in the other House that the Committee on Appropriations determined to correct that provision according to the amendment which I have offered, but by an oversight they failed to do it, and I desire to do in the Senate what the Appropriation Committee of the other House intended to do. I am authorized by the Representative of that district to say that the language of the amendment that I propose is perfectly satisfactory to the Appropriations Committee of the other House, and I therefore desire that the language of the bill shall be changed to read as follows:

Provided, That the owners of the civilian buildings and civilian interests now located at Fort Monroe, Va., shall bear the proportion of one-half of the expense of construction and maintenance of said sewer system—

That is exactly the provision of the bill, and to that provision the residents of Fort Monroe have no objection. They are perfectly willing to carry out this idea of contributing one-half to the sewerage system that has been laid out and agreed to by the military authorities, and which is acceptable to the citizens of that place—and which proportion the Secretary of War is authorized to assess against said owners apportioned justly and equitably between them, and collect and expend the same for such construction and maintenance.

That is the language of the bill.

And the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to assess upon vessels using the wharf at Fort Monroe, Va., one-half of the actual cost of repairs rendered necessary by the ordinary wear and tear of said wharf, and any damage done to said wharf by any vessel shall be paid for by the owner or owners of said vessel.

Provided further, That all moneys collected as above provided, or that may be received from other incidental sources from and after this date, be, and are hereby, made special contingent funds to be expended for the purpose for which the same are collected in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, who will render annually to Congress a detailed account of all receipts and expenditures.

This amendment, if adopted, imposes upon the civilian property owners of Fort Monroe one-half of the present sewerage system that has been approved by the military authorities, and leaves out of the bill the authority of the Secretary of War to enter upon any future improvements which he may choose, and assess upon the citizens such sum as he may think is just and proper to assess upon them to construct future systems of sewerage, or anything else that he may think is necessary.

I ask that this amendment be adopted. It carries out the views of the Committee on Appropriations of the other House and the views of the Secretary of War. I protest earnestly that the Senate has no right to place into the hands of the Secretary of War the power for all time to assess the citizens of Fort Monroe to carry out such improvements as in his opinion may be proper and just. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will please state his amendment again. Is it to strike out and insert?

Mr. HUNTON. Commencing at the word "provided," in line 22, page 2, I move to strike out all down to the next proviso in line 19, page 3, and insert what I have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that that part of what he read is also included in the proviso, after line 19.

Mr. HUNTON. I understand that, sir; but by striking out and inserting, as I propose, that is retained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to strike out to line 2 on page 4?

Mr. HUNTON. To the proviso on page 3, line 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the proviso beginning in line 22, page 2, and ending at line 19, page 3, and insert the following:

Provided, That the owners of the civilian buildings and the civilian interests now located at Fort Monroe, Va., shall bear the proportion of one-half of the expense of construction and maintenance of said sewer system, and which proportion the Secretary of War is authorized to assess against said owners, apportioned justly and equitably between them, and collect and expend the same for such construction and maintenance.

And the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to assess upon vessels using the wharf at Fort Monroe, Va., one-half the actual cost of repairs rendered necessary by the ordinary wear and tear of said wharf, and any damage done to said wharf by any vessel shall be paid for by the owner or owners of said vessel.

Provided further, That all moneys collected as above provided, or that may be received from and after this date, be, and are hereby, made special contingent funds to be expended for the purpose for which the same are collected in accordance with the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, who will render annually to Congress a detailed account of all receipts and expenditures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Virginia desires to strike out from the word "dollars" in line 22, page 2, down to and including the word "expenditures," in line 2, page 4, as his amendment covers all that subject.

Mr. HUNTON. I think not.

Mr. CALL. This amendment was before the Committee on Appropriations and was considered by them. It was understood that the Senator from Virginia should have the privilege of moving it in the Senate without objection. Perhaps it is not subject to a point of order, inasmuch as it makes no change in existing law and does not increase the appropriation in any way. Therefore it will have to be considered upon its merits. The only change made is that it is sought to limit the discretion of the Secretary of War to the construction and maintenance of sewers, whereas the appropriation in the bill as reported to the Senate and as adopted by the Senate with the committee amendment extends it to roads, streets, and lights, giving the Secretary of War the authority to assess, as Congress might authorize, for one-half of the cost of sewers, streets, roads, and lights. The objection that is made by the mover of the amendment is that the discretion in the Secretary of War is indefinite and unlimited, and that he might assess the occupants upon the military reservation such sum as he chooses as in his opinion may be required, and that that may be a very extravagant sum.

I do not myself see that there is any danger to the occupants upon the reservation who live there without any compensation to the Government, merely as a gratuity, nor that there is any danger in the exercise of this authority by the Secretary of War to the extent of being a severe contribution imposed upon them. Therefore, I have not agreed to the amendment, but if there is any limitation put upon the power, which will allow it to extend to streets and sewers, and define the limitation clearly to be one-half of such amount as shall be authorized by Congress, I do not see that there is any great point in the contention one way or the other. Certainly the authority of the Secretary of War, whatever it is, should extend to providing not only sewerage, which, according to the report of Col. Davis, is in a dreadful condition, but also to providing for the large number of pleasure seekers and occupants who are now upon that reservation proper streets, and lights, and the usual accompaniments of a town, where the comfort and the health and the safety of the people are concerned.

That a wharf built by the Government, which is entirely a public work, a large and expensive wharf, requiring an annual appropriation for its maintenance, and the levy of rates and tolls upon those using the wharf, are the subject of contention involved in the amendment. Unless the Senator can change his amendment to such a form as to limit the discretion of the Secretary of War, as to the amount which he may demand, and apply it to roads, and streets, and lights, I am not disposed for one to agree to the amendment. With that limitation, I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. I am making a modification of the amendment that will be satisfactory to the Senator who has charge of the bill, and I beg that the vote be not taken until I can finish it. [A pause.]

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Virginia will read the amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. We have about agreed upon an amendment.

Mr. CALL. Let it be read at the desk.

Mr. HUNTON. I withdraw the amendment that I offered awhile ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia withdraws the amendment previously offered.

Mr. HUNTON. In line 9, page 3, after the word "thereat," I move to insert "one-half of;" and in line 11, after the word "of," to strike out "existing works, or the construction, improvement, maintenance, and operation of such other works."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "thereat," in line 9, page 3, insert "one-half of;" and in line 11, page 3, strike out "existing works, or the construction, improvement, maintenance, and operation of such other works;" so as to read:

Provided That the owners of hotels and of other nonmilitary buildings now at Fort Monroe, Va., shall bear one-half of the expense of construction of the said sewer, and the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to equitably and justly apportion among, assess against, and collect from the said owners and to expend in construction of the said sewer the moiety of the estimated cost thereof; and he is also authorized and directed from time to time to cause to be assessed upon and collected from the owners of nonmilitary buildings situated within the limits of the Fort Monroe military reservation, and from individuals or corporations engaged in business thereat, one-half of such sum or sums of money as he may deem just, reasonable, and necessary for expenditure upon the repair and operation of such as roads, streets, lights, sewerage, and general police, as, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, should be constructed and maintained in order to protect the interests of the United States, and the interests, health, and general welfare of the said nonmilitary interests now established or that may hereafter be established at Fort Monroe.

Mr. CALL. I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The word "as" after "such" in line 13 will be stricken out if there be no objection. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CALL. I submit the following statement as to the appropriations made by the bill:

The items of increase made in the House bill are as follows:

R. 6518) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire that the bill be read and that we pass upon the amendments of the committee as we reach them, following the usual form.

Mr. MILLS. That is, that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for action on the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the formal reading will be dispensed with and the amendments of the Committee will be considered as they are reached.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 2, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-one;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Red Hook and Gowanus Creek channels, New York: Continuing improvement under the project to obtain 21 feet of water, $50,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I rise to ask the chairman of the committee as to the amendment beginning in line 14, on page 8. Is there a report from any engineer officer of the War Department recommending the proposed improvement embraced in the paragraph just read, and has any estimate been made or any plan submitted at any time for it?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir. No item in the bill was more deliberately considered than the one to which the Senator refers. It underwent several changes, and it was finally adjusted to conform to what was thought to be best upon consultation with the engineers in charge and the Senators from New York.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Has it been recommended by the engineer? Col. Gillespie is the engineer in charge.

Mr. RANSOM. I am sorry I can not go into these details.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This is susceptible of an easy answer.

Mr. RANSOM. I prefer to be my own judge upon that matter, and not have the Senator from Louisiana answer for me.

I said distinctly that this amendment was the subject of discussion at least three different times, upon three different days, or perhaps more, and this was the final form accepted after consultation with the engineers in charge, the people engaged in commerce, and the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY], who is a member of the committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This particular improvement, in reference to which I made the inquiry, was reported upon adversely by Lieut. Col. Gillespie, the United States engineer officer in charge, to the last Congress. The purpose of my inquiry was to ascertain whether there had been from that officer, or any other, any subsequent favorable report upon this project, submitting plans and estimates of the work. To that inquiry no answer is given.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I understand this improvement is embraced in the text of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and it is fully described and recommended in the report of the Chief of Engineers on page 101.

The committee simply divided this proposed improvement, making, as it will be seen, the Bay Ridge channel 26 feet, leaving the other at Red Hook and Gowanus Creek at 21 feet, and putting the work under the contract system.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Senator from Oregon is mistaken.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not think I am.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think the Senotor is mistaken when he says that this particular appropriation or project is included in the text of the bill as it came from the House. I refer to the words stricken out on page 8, from line 7 to line 13, inclusive. That I understand to be the Senator's statement.

In the bill as it came from the House the item alluded to by the Senator from Oregon relates to Red Hook and Gowanus Creek channel and to Bay Ridge channel, but not to any such improvement in Bay Ridge channel as that contemplated in the paragraph of the bill to which I have called attention. The project is a new one, and I think there is no report of the engineer officer to justify its incorporation in the pending bill.

I have no disposition to oppose it, but must express dissent to the policy of adopting projects of improvement not recommended by engineers of the Government in charge.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not understand that the Senator desires to oppose the amendment, but I wish to say what the chairman of the committee has already said, that perhaps there is no item in this bill which was more thoroughly investigated and over which there was probably more discussion and more hearings than the amendment to which the Senator refers. The committee, I think, after many hearings and full hearings, determined substantially unanimously that the provision beginning in line 14, on page 8, should be adopted as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I said I had no wish to oppose the amendment. I merely desired to state that I doubt very much the advisability of this project being in the bill. It was placed by the Senate in the river and harbor bill of 1892, and after full consideration in conference, it went out except as to a limited improvement in that channel. I know of no further report from the engineer changing his views. I repeat, the report submitted to the last Congress was adverse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 9, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Great Sodus Bay, New York: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 17, after the word "breakwater," to insert "and not exceeding $10,000 of which may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be used for removing rock to widen and deepen the inner harbor near the mouth of the Oswego River;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Oswego, N. Y: Continuing improvement, $37,000, of which $10,000 shall be expended in repairing the breach recently made in the breakwater; and not exceeding $10,000 of which may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be used for removing rock to widen and deepen the inner harbor near the mouth of the Oswego River.

Improving Tonawanda Harbor and Niagara River, New York: Continuing improvement, $50,000, and the unexpended balance of the appropriations heretofore made for the improvement of the Niagara River from Tonawanda to Port Day, N. Y., is hereby transferred and appropriated for this improvement.

Mr. CULLOM. There was a mistake made by the committee in the amendment which has just been read by the Secretary. I have received a telegram from the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY], who is a member of the Committee on Commerce, whose attention has been called to the matter, desiring it to be corrected. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to take the place of the committee amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. The committee amendment should be disagreed to first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment of the committee will be disagreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is disagreed to. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, it is proposed to substitute for the clause from line 5 to line 10, inclusive, the following:

Improving Niagara River from Tonawanda to Fort Day, N.Y., $20,000; and the unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore made for this improvement is hereby reappropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 10, line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty" and insert "sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Raritan Bay, New Jersey: Continuing improvement, $40,000, one-half of which, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, shall be used in dredging bar between South Amboy and Great Beds Light. This appropriation shall include a survey between South Amboy and Great Beds Light, with a view to deepening the channel to 21 feet at mean low water.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 1, after the word "maintenance," to insert "and widening channel to 1,000 feet;" and in line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "two hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Baltimore, Md.: For maintenance and widening channel to 1,000 feet, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred and ten;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Norfolk and its approaches, Virginia: Continuing improvement, $110,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 7, before the word "thousand," to insert "and thirty;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 16, to insert:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to pay to said C. P.
